Regrettably, she devotes precious little space to Shawn's early years at The New Yorker, the first issue of which appeared in February 1925. Shawn, born in Chicago, submitted his first article to the magazine in the early 1930s. A report on a pickle barrel factory in New Jersey, it was never used.

Yet, in the words of Mehta, a staff writer who revered him, Shawn was a fluent and natural writer whose prose bore the unmistakable mark of his character – simple, direct and generous. Still, in all the years he was at The New Yorker, he published only one piece, entitled The Catastrophe. It was a one-page fantasy concerning the destruction of New York City by a meteor while the rest of the world goes about its business as usual.

For reasons that are never explained by either Ross or Mehta, the magazine hired Shawn as a reporter after his inauspicious pickle barrel assignment. In 1935, he was shifted to the research department. Four years later, he was named managing editor of the fact department, a position which put him in charge of all non-fiction.

At their first meeting, Shawn made a powerful impression on Mehta, an Indian national whose eye for detail is belied by his blindness. He was particularly impressed by Shawn's utter lack of self-importance.

Shawn treated all writers equally, and left them alone. "The fact that writers from the 1920s and writers from the 1980s could work under the same roof and could write for the same New Yorker was testimony to the magazine's continuity and to Mr. Shawn's ability to assimilate in his magazine styles from many generations of writers."

Immensely loyal to his writers, Shawn never wavered in his support of them. "It was as if only death could part the two," Mehta notes.

His loyalty was certainly a factor in his success. In a memo once penned to the publisher, Shawn outlined the hallmarks of a great editor. "He must have art sense, editorial instincts, the feeling for a good story, but most important, the ability to establish a good relationship with writers on staff, and the skills to help (them) cope with their inevitable insecurities."

William Shawn

Shawn spared no expense to getting it right. Even after the magazine had gone to press, he gave no thought to making a correction, Mehta writes.

As refined by Shawn, the editing process was rigorous, perhaps pedantic. Galleys were read by Shawn himself, a lawyer, a fact checker and an editor who vetted them for grammar, sense, clarity and consistency.

Mehta is bitter about Shawn's sudden dismissal. The New Yorker, owned by the Fleischmann family, was sold to the Newhouse media empire in 1985. In 1987, Shawn was fired after 55 years of service and replaced by Robert Gottlieb, editor-in-chief and president of Alfred A. Knopf, a subsidiary of Random House.

In Mehta's view, the new proprietors "destroyed" The New Yorker, a judgment which, in hindsight, appears rash. Today, the magazine is different but as good as it was during the Shawn era.

Mehta's epilogue, concerning the final five years of Shawn's life, is infused with sadness. After he was pushed out, Shawn never regained his bearings, and died with the conviction that the magazine he had shepherded to greatness had irretrievably declined. Poor Shawn.

We'd like to wish you a happy and healthy Passover Holiday.

New JWI program reaches out to mothers

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
CJN Staff

TORONTO — A new program, sponsored by Jewish Women International (JWI), is designed to give mothers the break they need.

Called MOM. (Mom's Own Moment), the course consists of a series of eight topical seminars and workshops held Friday mornings at the Bathurst Jewish Centre (BJC). Babysitting is available at the BJC.

Penny Krowitz, executive director of JWI, said the program evolved due to a need by some women to get involved in the Jewish community, yet not in the traditional way. "Many of them look at organizations as a place for their mothers or grandmothers, but not for them," she said.

Although women's roles have changed from a generation ago, their basis needs are still the same, said Krowitz. "They still want to socialize and be connected with like-minded women, and they do want to connect to the Jewish community. These needs have remained constant, no matter what the generation."

There is a growing trend, she said, for women to stay home with their children, whether they are stay-at-home mothers, work part time around their children's schedules, or work at a home-based business. "Whatever their situation, they need something to stimulate them during the day, and get out and meet others like themselves. There was little out there for them."

She said a group of women, got together to discuss the matter, and MOM. was born. "They planned the two-hour programs themselves. Topics include making the right educational choice for your kids; Judaic art created by me; how to make $100 grow and grow; the latest trends in decorating; and taking the best pictures of your kids. There is a wonderful broad spectrum of topics, with something of interest for everyone."

She said that the program is being run as a pilot. "We are hoping that this group will bond, and will continue meeting in some format. We plan on working with them if they show an interest in joining the organization in a format that is workable for them. If they just want to register, however, that is perfectly fine."

The cost of the program is $85 (babysitting extra). Deadline for registration is April 6. Call 630-9313 for more information.

Jewish covenant symbolized by brit milah blood

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The covenant between God and the Jewish people is not symbolized by the brit milah itself, but by the blood that comes with it, according to Rabbi Lawrence Hoffman, professor of liturgy at Hebrew Union College-Jewish Institute of Religion in New York.

Rabbi Hoffman was speaking at a lecture entitled Brit Milah: sign of the covenant, sign of the times? sponsored by Kolel: a Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning. The program was held at Holy Blossom Temple.

If it were only the ceremony of circumcision, he explained, then it would not be incumbent on those converting and already circumcized, and those born without a foreskin, to have a ritual drop of blood taken from the penis.

The blood of circumcision, he said, joins with the blood of the paschal lamb, whose blood was smeared on the doorposts of Jewish homes in Egypt to complete the covenant.

Those two commandments, said Rabbi Hoffman, circumcision and the sacrifice of the paschal lamb, are what was thought to lead to salvation. He quoted a passage from Ezekiel that said, "I passed by you and saw you wallowing in your blood, and I said, "In your blood live...In your blood live" (16:6)

On the other hand, he asked, why does a man's blood bring salvation, while a woman's menstrual blood pollutes?

Culturally, he said, women are seen as being associated with nature – wild, threatening, uncontrolled. "Nature is to be feared because it is uncontrolled. Circumcision symbolizes that men are controlled, something that all cultures value."

What we know about Judaism, he said, comes often from edited and laundered texts, texts which are often, not only imperfectly preserved, but different in different editions.

"Judaism is a living thing," Rabbi Hoffman said. "Some things are good, some things are neutral, some we would rather not remember. That is the complexity of the Jewish religion."

For instance, he said, Christianity began by accepting the concept of the two bloods, just as Jews did. However, when they decided that they would not accept mitzvot such as circumcision, only the paschal lamb was left as a means to salvation.

The notion in the eucharist, that wine is the reminder of that blood, they got from the Palestinian Talmud, which says that the wine at the seder is the blood of the lamb.

"Christians used [that concept]. Jews forgot about it.

The fact that women were exempt from certain areas of religious life, and from observing some commandments, was not connected with women's intellectual abilities, he said.

According to his research, in the Middle Ages women had a great deal to do with religious life, even if they were not obligated.

The rabbis of that time, Rabbi Hoffman said, made circumcision into an all-male event, partly, he believes, as a reaction to Christian asceticism, and because of a climate of "moral puritanism" that made it somehow improper for women to be involved in such things.

He quoted a 1285 ruling by Rabbi Samson ben Tsadok (the Tashbetz) that implied that at that time, women brought their infant sons into the synagogue for the brit, and the circumcision was performed on her lap. What he was concerned about, it appears, is that observers might get the impression that something improper was going on, even if nothing in fact was.

Dr. Yoel Abells, a Reform mohel, one of the moderators of the program, noted that people see brit milah differently than in the past, and that we must be sensitive to those differences.

As well, he said, Jews must recognize the importance of including women in the ritual, as mohelet, for example.

During the question period, a member of the audience asked about the movement by some men to reverse circumcision by restoring the foreskin. He raised the issues of lack of consent by the infant, the amount of pain, and the ramifications, which he said include poor sexual functioning, impotence in middle age, neuroses, and a lack of self-esteem.

Co-moderator Dr. Rochelle Schwartz, a family practitioner and mohelet, said that there is "no compelling reason to go against Jewish tradition." Many mohalim, she said, including Orthodox, use painkillers.

As well, there are certain health benefits, and there is no evidence of impotence or other sexual problems, she said.

About consent, she noted that "we don't ask babies about vaccination, or piercing their ears – we just do it."

Education seen as the key to win loyalty to Judaism

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
CJN Staff

TORONTO — In a free society such as ours, all Jews are Jews by choice, says Rabbi Irving Greenberg.

"If Jewish life is of a high level, they will remain Jews, otherwise people will become attracted to the open society," said Rabbi Greenberg, president of Chaverim Kol Yisrael/Jewish Life Network and founding president of CLAL National Jewish Centre for Learning and Leadership.

Rabbi Greenberg was part of a panel at the Leonard Wolinsky Lectures on Jewish Life and Education, held recently at York University. The lecture was held in celebration of the establishment of the Koschitzky chair in Jewish teacher education at York University. Other panel members were Barry Holtz, a professor at the Jewish Theological Seminary in New York; Michael Shire, director of the Centre for Jewish Education in London, England; and Dvora Steinmetz, founder of Beit Rabban, an independent day school in New York and a teacher at the Drisha Institute, a school for adult women, founded by her husband.

Rabbi Greenberg said there is no other way to win loyalty to Judaism except through education. "Our goal should be universal literacy – living life through Jewish eyes."

The five building blocks to committed Judaism, he said, are Hebrew day schools, Jewish camps, Israel, youth movements and adult learning. "These are the keys to a literate, high-functioning Jewish community. They all have a total immersion-type of learning, which is the key."

The weakness of Sunday schools and afternoon Hebrew programs, he said, are that they are a deviation from normal life. "They are a temporary society. In a total universe, people absorb more deeply."

Although most Hebrew schools and camps are denominational, he said, denominations are no longer the essence of their approach. "There are issues that transcend denominational lines. All the denominations share these issues. Whether a congregation, for example, prays in Hebrew, in the language of their country, or a combination of both, they are all correct. We are coming to understand that dancing and singing are something that liberal Jews and Orthodox Jews do.

Credit given

"Reform Jews must be given credit for thinking that they cannot ignore modern culture, and Orthodox Jews must be given credit for not bending the rules. All these views are true, and each group has something to learn from the other."

People should not be bound to any one denomination, said Rabbi Greenberg, but rather, should come to grips with pluralism. "The true choice is pluralism. It says that 'I know the limits of my situation.' If you don't know your limits, you are dangerous or insane. When you recognize your limits, you are accepting of others and you are free, not only to listen, but to learn."

Holtz said that Jewish education cannot be wedged into the definition of general education. "We have to prepare leaders and teachers to deal with the fact that the big agenda in Jewish education is education for the purpose of commitment. The system fails if students come out knowledgeable but uncommitted. Mere learning is not the be all and end all of a Jewish education."

There is also a spiritual element to a Jewish education, he said. "We care about our leader's own religious growth. We don't want principals running a school if they have no relationship to prayer or Jewish practice. We care that our leaders are people with commitments."

Children, said Shire, have a natural relationship to God, which they often tend to lose as they get older. "God-talk is part of childhood, but for some reason, something seems to happen. They suppress their natural religious inclination."

He would like to see young people, after childhood, develop a religious outlook, and a commitment to spiritual awareness. To develop that, he said, young people need to be involved in an encounter experience such as a trip to Israel or summer camp. "Through an encounter experience, comes reflection and thinking. It is the role of the educator to guide the youth through their experience. This educator has the role of being the midwife to tradition."

Steinmetz said that women still need to gain tremendous ground in education. "Huge things still need to happen. There is no real place for women to serve in society. There is no true learning context equivalent to the male yeshiva, where a woman can involve herself in Torah study and prepare herself for a life of Torah study."

The only way to make change, she said, is "to pay attention to how we teach children – how we teach the boys and the girls."

Help us move into our new home.

The new Apotex Centre, Jewish Home for the Aged, and The Centre for Cognitive Disorders is going up.

It's going up at a tremendous pace.

The concrete shell of the building will be completed this winter. Anticipation is building. In those areas already poured, the walls of residents rooms are going up, the plumbing's going in and the wiring is being installed. Residents are looking forward to moving into a new facility that's much better equipped to meet the needs of seniors.

And, their anticipation will be rewarded. The rooms will be bigger, and all rooms will be private. Each room will have an entrance foyer and an ensuite washroom almost twice as large as in the current building.

This excellent new facility has been made possible by the generosity of our community. It's a wonderful achievement. If you have made a gift, please accept our thanks. If you haven't, please consider making a contribution to the ongoing work of one of the finest seniors' facilities anywhere.

For more information on how you can be part of completing the Apotex Centre, Jewish Home for the Aged, and the Centre for Cognitive Disorders, call Shirley Worth in the Baycrest Centre Foundation at (416) 785-2500, Ext. 2013.

Norma Mamott

Norma Mamott thinks that her position as community fundraiser for the Association for the Soldiers of Israel, is not a great leap from her life as singer/comedian Norma Davis.

Mamott, who trained at the Lorne Green Academy of Radio Arts, says that her experience working in nightclubs, entertaining troops in Korea and Japan, and as a puppeteer at the Ontario Science Centre, prepared her to deal with the public and relate to a variety of people.

She has worked at the Association for the Soldiers of Israel and the Canadian Zionist Cultural Organization since 1980, and chances are, if you've ever called the office, you've spoken to her.

She speaks to donors, people who want to buy memorial or greeting cards "or people who just want to talk. I think of myself as the link between the soldiers and the public. We want the soldiers to know that the Diaspora is thinking of them.

"We're a bulabutish organization. Our funds go towards providing the soldiers with the things that the Israeli government cannot afford to give them. When people call in, I want them to know that they are appreciated."

Suellen Boyd, the office administrator, calls Mamott a "people person. Ninety percent of the people who call in want to talk, and she talks to them.

"I believe, that Norma single handedly built up the business. She listens to people and she charms them. She takes her job beyond taking orders. Everything she does has that personal touch."

Holocaust survivors, says Mamott, are among the organization's strongest supporters. "They, particularly, care for the soldiers. They know the importance of the survival of Israel. I can't tell you how many times someone has told me that if Israel had been there for them, they may have had a family today."

Mamott, who has one daughter and two grandchildren, says being a Jew has always been important to her, and this job is a logical step in her career. "I love working. It keeps my mind young and it keeps me active. I plan on retiring when I am 120."

Educator stresses benefits of counselling whole family

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Schools and communities are in crisis when it comes to educating and raising children, according to Marv Sniderman, who had 30 years of teaching, counselling and administrative leadership experience at the North York Board of Education and is a family counsellor in private practice.

The difficulties are greater because there is a growing proportion of families with children under 18 who are headed by a single parent, and there are more stepfamilies, common-law arrangements and other socio-economic changes, Sniderman said in an interview.

"It's difficult to define a family today. There appears to be a critical need for family therapists to focus on the needs of children.

"Although some families with child/school difficulties turn to outside agencies including family therapy, many are reluctant to seek help outside the school system. In many cases, they tend to emphasize the problem of the child in school rather than addressing the broader family issues.

Marvin Sniderman

"Parenting today's adolescents [also] appears to be more difficult than in previous years because of the far-reaching technological and sociological changes. With changes come benefits to our society, but problems as well."

Traditionally, the student has been targeted as the problem, he said. "The goals for the student are generally specific and school-related, such as improved grades, less acting out or completing assignments.

"It is my contention that effective family counselling can reach beyond specific interventions to more comprehensive, lasting changes."

What is important, he believes, is the need to help family members develop clear communication, expand awareness and learn to cope with demands and changes.

"It is important to create an active hierarchical structure where parents are in charge of their children while giving them increasing independence and freedom as children to mature."

The role of the therapist or counsellor is to help clients develop problem-solving skills, he said.

"My philosophy is that therapy should be as brief as possible, because most people want resolution of some problematic symptoms; and therapy should be solution-focused and action-oriented and should deal with present interactions."

Sniderman said it is important to work with the whole family. This gives him the opportunity to observe how individual family members interact with each other within the family. This leads to strategies for helping each person.

Using a speaker/listener technique, Sniderman teaches children and adults the value of listening first and then speaking. Keeping the discussion to one person at a time and one subject at a time, and rephrasing for clarification are skills incorporated into his technique, along with established rules for both the speaker and the listener.

He says that as a family counsellor, "There is an inner satisfaction in knowing that I am helping others to help themselves."

He was involved in virtually every aspect of synagogue life, said his son Melvin.

Alex Koenigsberg

Born in Brezovica in the former Czechoslovakia, he studied at the famed Nitra Yeshiva in Slovakia. During World War II, he was sent off to a forced labor camp and was later incarcerated at Dachau and Birkenau, part of the Auschwitz complex. Both his parents were murdered in the camps.

After liberation, he became an administrator at two Displaced Persons camps in Austria where he lived with his wife, Ida Zimmerman, whom he married in 1946.

He came to Toronto in 1951 and trained as a tailor. He worked in the garment trade briefly before being hired as the sexton at Adath Israel, known popularly as the Romanian Shul, then located at College and Bathurst streets.

In those early days, Koenigsberg did everything from custodial work to scheduling bnei mitzvah, recalled Rabbi Erwin Schild, the synagogue's spiritual leader until his retirement in 1989.

"He was the janitor, the assistant cantor, he booked simchot and he was the Torah reader," Rabbi Schild said. "He did it all."

When the synagogue moved "uptown" in 1956 to its current location at Bathurst and Wilson, "he looked after everything. He played a major role in the new building."

In 1969, the congregation honored Koenigsberg at a tribute dinner, as did State of Israel Bonds in 1980. In 1994, the Alex Koenigsberg Conservatory was opened at the synagogue, consisting of a chapel, library and board room. An endowment fund in his name continues to fund adult education and new resources for the shul.

As the synagogue prospered over the years, it hired bookkeeping and janitorial staff. But Koenigsberg kept busy with bookings, services and the overall running of the shul.

As sexton emeritus, he scaled back somewhat, leading the synagogue's second minyan. But he still had a hand in the congregation's direction.

"His whole life revolved around the synagogue," Rabbi Schild remarked. "He was a wonderful individual, with a tremendous sense of ahavat Yisrael (love of the Jewish people) and he continued studying Torah. He was the most beloved person in our congregation."

He leaves his wife Ida; sons Melvin and George; daughter Brenda Shear; and nine grandchildren.

Russian Jews targetted by messianic groups

Rabbi Yoseph Zaltzman, head of the Jewish Russian Community Centre (JRCC) and unofficial spiritual leader of Toronto's 40,000 Russian and ex-Soviet Jews, uses stronger terms. He calls the lure of the missionaries "a spiritual holocaust."

It's impossible to say how many are attracted to Christianity, he says. "Even one is too many. Unfortunately, many [Jewish Russians] are an easy target. They are told they are still Jewish but they can believe in Christianity."

The answer, says Rabbi Zaltzman, lies in better and more proactive Jewish education programs for emigres. That's one reason the JRCC last year hired a director of its new Centre for Jewish Studies, which offers a myriad of programs in Russian and English.

Jews for Judaism's volunteer-run Russian task force has initiated several programs. Rabbi Michael Skobac, the group's education director, has presented seminars at the JRCC on Rockford Road, warning of the messianic threat.

Sasha Katz, a young Jewish immigrant from Kiev who was once a member of a messianic "synagogue," also presents programs in Russian, both through the Russian centre and Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS).

Most recently, task force members, led by Jews for Judaism's executive director, Julius Ciss, picketed outside New Covenant House (also known as the Toronto Jewish Mission) on Sheppard Avenue, which has long been accused of targeting Russians. This time, the mission was charged with actively proselytizing unsuspecting Russian Jews in the guise of classes in English as a second language.

Jews for Judaism calls it a "stealth" campaign. They say the Russians come for English lessons and instead get instruction in the Christian Gospels.

Rev. Douglas Freeman, pastor at New Covenant House, refused to answer The CJN's questions about the classes.

In 1996, the Toronto branch of Jews for Jesus hired a full-time Russian outreach worker. According to the organization's newsletter at the time, Boris Bekerman was a Russian Jewish believer "who met his Messiah" in 1993. He was hired to go door-to-door in Russian-Jewish areas of Toronto and, according to Jews for Jesus, three people "received Y'shua [Jesus] as their Savior and Lord!

"Please pray for our continued outreach to the Russian Jewish people," the newsletter implored.

Asked by The CJN whether Bekerman is still on staff, Andrew Barron, Toronto director of Jews for Jesus, laughed and referred the question to the organization's international headquarters in San Francisco.

Susan Pearlman of the international headquarters told The CJN that Bekerman is no longer active in Toronto. She said she did not know why.

Jews for Judaism says several messianic congregations in Toronto distribute material printed in Russian, bearing Jewish symbols like Stars of David and Torah scrolls. According to the group, there are at least two congregations in the city geared especially to Russians: Beth Sar Shalom and Shaarei Yeshua, which was said to meet at the Centennial Library on Finch Avenue, near Bathurst Street. Jews for Judaism says simultaneous Russian translation of services was offered at both places.

However, there was no Russian translation of the English services attended by The CJN at Beth Sar Shalom. And an official at the Centennial Library said Shaarei Yeshua had not used the facilities for a long time.

Rich of Chosen People Ministries told The CJN that Russian translation used to be provided at Beth Sar Shalom, but not anymore.

He estimates that a quarter of his congregants are Russian immigrants, "but they all speak and understand English now." He said he has not noticed an increase in the number of Russian speakers attending his congregation. "We're obligated by our faith to reach out to all people," Rich said. "We don't focus on Russians."

Begging to differ is Rabbi Skobac, who believes that supply for the demand by Christian missionary groups was provided by the fall of communism, after which thousands of Russian and ex-Soviet Jews poured into Toronto.

The end of communism opened the window for messianic groups everywhere, Rabbi Skobac feels.

"Hundreds of them went to Russia after the fall of communism in order to start saving souls. And because [state-mandated] atheism was over, people were open to receiving the Gospel."

So, many Jews were already exposed to Jesus before leaving. And even during the 1970s and '80s, the leanest years of Jewish emigration, those Jews who did get out were often met by so called Hebrew-Christian missionaries at transit points like Ladispoli in Italy.

Outreach groups successful in Israel

Rabbi Skobac points out that these Christian outreach groups have become especially successful in the United States, Germany and ironically, Israel, where the Knesset is still struggling with bills aimed at limiting their influence.

In Toronto, Russian Jews are getting sucked in for the same reasons as their brothers and sisters around the world: they arrive with little or no Jewish education, and often, the first religious congregation that contacts them is a messianic one. After that, "they just try to fit in," Rabbi Skobac says. "They're told they can stay Jewish and still believe in Jesus."

Another selling point is these messianic congregations' style of outreach: friendly, warm and inclusive. Sasha Katz, the young emigre from Kiev, remembers it well.

Now a poised 25-year-old business student at York University, he arrived in Toronto in 1991 with very little Jewish background. He had no bar mitzvah, and only his parents and the state made him aware of his Jewishness. "We were cultural and gastronomic Jews," he says.

Sponsored by an aunt who had converted to Christianity years before, Katz was taken to what he thought was a synagogue just 10 days after he arrived. It was Congregation Melech Yisrael on Ranee Avenue.

"People were so nice to me," he recalls. "It was very welcoming and friendly." After he rented his own apartment, he realized that his fellow congregants were his only friends in Canada. "So it went from a social thing to a religious thing," and he got more deeply involved. "I liked these people, so I accepted Jesus into my heart."

Another move, this time to North York, put Katz in touch with a Lubavitch family, who invited him to stay one Shabbat. The family, upon hearing the young man's adoration of Jesus, connected him to Jews for Judaism. Katz spent many sessions with Ciss, and began exploring Jewish outreach groups like Aish Hatorah.

The people at Melech Yisrael weren't happy about this development. "They told me that Julius [Ciss] was the devil," Katz remembers. "They had no intellectual argument against him, so they used an emotional one."

Slowly but surely, Katz returned to the Jewish fold. These days, he lectures for Jews for Judaism and attends the Orthodox Shaarei Tefillah Congregation. He sees his episode as a Jew who worshipped Jesus typical of the dangers which lie before ex-Soviet emigres.

As for the solution, Katz cites increased outreach and education, but also says Russian Jews need to be met with a more mainstream approach after they arrive. Rabbis connected to the Russian community are all chassidic, and that may put off many immigrants who have so little Jewish knowledge.

Asked whether messianic congregations posing as synagogues target Russian Jews, Katz doesn't pause. "One-hundred percent," he says.

Rev. Douglas Freeman (left), pastor at New Covenant House, is confronted by Julius Ciss, executive director of Jews for Judaism, and volunteers Sarita Walerstein and Michael Joffe (holding signs). The Sheppard Avenue mission is accused of proselytizing Russian Jewish immigrants.

Day school students face off in hockey tourney

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It's not clear whether it was the last-minute come from behind victory or the pizza lunch that got the boys most excited, but either way, the annual Yitzhak Rabin Hockey Tournament proved a roaring success yet again.

Six teams from seven Jewish day schools (two paired up to ice one team) faced off at Chesswood Arena for this year's extravaganza and get-together.

Following last year's pattern, Associated's Kamin Kings locked horns with USDS Bayview in the championship matchup.

This one proved a real see-saw affair that had an estimated 200 fans at the edges of their seats. USDS jumped into an early 1-0 lead, but from there the contest proved to be a real nail-biter with both teams taking turns being stymied on good scoring chances, said Steve Stern, coach of the Kings.

The tide turned late in the third period when the Kings foiled a close-in scoring chance and roared up the ice on a counterattack. Adam Gold carried the puck deep into the USDS end, cut around a defenceman and tucked the puck between the Bayview goaltender's legs with 1:52 left on the clock.

The place erupted with cheers, signalling a major shift of momentum. With Bayview reeling, Associated kept up the pressure. The puck quickly ended up in the corner deep in the USDS end, with right-winger Kyle Pasternac on a mission to retrieve it. He got control and centred it to leftwinger Jory Stern who buried a one-timer with 1:02 left to play.

The place went nuts.

Coach Stern called the Kings' win "a combined effort of the whole team. They all played well... It's unfortunate that somebody had to lose."

In addition to the finalists, teams from USDS Richmond Hill, Associated's Neptune and Leslie branches (they iced one team), Leo Baeck and Bialik took part in the tournament. The Kings beat Bialik 3-1 in the semi-final while Bayview advanced to the championship with a 3-1 win over Leo Baeck.

All the boys and girls who took part had an "absolutely fantastic day," Stern said. Besides the hockey, they enjoyed getting together with friends from other Jewish schools over a pizza lunch.

Debbie Noyek, whose son, Adam, played for USDS Bayview, and Arlyn Zimmerman, with two kids in the tournament, organized the event.

"It was our first year putting it together. It was a lot of work, but it was a lot of fun," she said.

The tournament created tremendous school spirit and brought together friends from other Jewish schools, she said.

In addition to the tournament, the schools played about a dozen 7 a.m. exhibition games against each other, beginning in January, Stern said.

"The kids just eat it up," he said. Even though many of the boys play for other teams, "the pride and joy of playing for their school is just tremendous."

Mission to Israel reveals array of social problems

No one who has been on a visit to Israel over the last decade could fail to have noticed the proliferation of super highways, five-star restaurants and hotels, single family dwellings, shopping malls and other signs of Westernization.

Is it any wonder that an increasing number of North American Jews are questioning why, if the Israeli lifestyle is so close to our own, Israel's needs should take priority over those of our own communities?

Consequently, there is a growing trend among North American Jewish communities to lower their United Jewish Appeal (UJA) allocations to Israel and overseas communities in favor of local needs.

Tragically, there is a heavy price being paid both in Israel and the Former Soviet Union (FSU) as a result of this perception.

The Voyage to Discovery II, a UIA/Federation mission to Israel and the Crimea last January, was an attempt to address this issue.

Many of the participants had come with a belief that the needs of our local communities were at least as important to those of Israel. Throughout the course of the week however, we came to the realization that Israel's outward signs of prosperity are, in fact, masking a huge array of social problems that can be attributed to the staggering number of immigrants absorbed over the last 10 years.

As for the needs of the Jewish communities in the FSU, these have been easy to overlook, due, to some extent, to the fact that the Israel and overseas allocation is presented as one category. At the end of the mission the majority of participants completely reversed their thinking on the subject of the responsibility of North American Jewish communities towards Israel and beleaguered communities throughout the world. This article is an attempt to explain why.

Our mission took us to the Crimea, a peninsula in the southern Ukraine that juts out onto the Black Sea. We visited Simferopol, the capital city of the Crimean region and the resort city of Yalta.

During our short stay we were hosted by two organizations – the Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI) and the Joint Distribution Committee (JDC or "the Joint") – which are facilitating the revitalization of Jewish life in the FSU.

Although their mandates differ, both organizations are literally saving Jewish lives and Jewish life in the FSU. JAFI works with that segment of the population for whom aliyah to Israel is a viable alternative to a bleak future in the Ukraine while the DJC helps those who lack the strength or will to leave the FSU.

The Joint's presence in the FSU dates back to the 1917 revolution when it came to the aid of impoverished Jews and those who were victims of pogroms. A 50-year absence caused by the Joint's expulsion by the Soviet State in 1938, ended with the perestroika and glasnost of 1988.

Since then the Joint and JAFI have established an extraordinary infrastructure of welfare centres across the FSU that has led to a virtual explosion of Jewish communal life.

The thousands of welfare professionals and volunteers mobilized by these centres have provided literally millions of food packages and hot meals. They made millions of homecare visits, loaned medical equipment and supplied fuel, clothing and blankets to elderly and impoverished Jews throughout the last decade.

We were taken in small groups on visits to elderly shut-ins. Our group visited 86-year-old Rosa, who lives in a dilapidated building on an old-age pension of $20 a month.

Rosa lost her husband and two children and her remaining child has left the country. Although visited weekly by a JDC welfare worker, and helped occasionally by her neighbors, she spends most of her time alone.

She was delighted to meet us, people she viewed as her benefactors. We realized that, prior to this visit, we had little awareness of the scope of the organization that supports Rosa.

In Simferopol we were taken to a Jewish Agency educational facility where hundreds of aliyah candidates and their families are enrolled in Hebrew classes and support groups.

We sat in on one class where adult students were learning vocabulary appropriate for a night out on the town in Tel Aviv.

When asked what they had heard about life in Israel, they answered honestly. Yes, they'd heard a great deal about the difficulties of absorption from friends and relatives already living in Israel. Nevertheless they were ready to go there because they had no future in the Ukraine.

Our next stop was a teacher training class for another group of adult students who had decided to delay their own aliyah and take on the role of passing their knowledge of their Jewish heritage to their peers.

Their teacher had made aliyah years earlier but had returned to the FSU to give something back by involving herself in training another generation of teachers.

On our final stop at this facility we stepped into a room where a support group for parents whose children have already made aliyah, was in progress. While some spoke about their intention to follow their children to Israel, we sensed that the decision to emigrate was fraught with complications. Many parents are intermarried and cannot, in many cases, agree on whether or not they should leave the Ukraine.

But there was one message that was unmistakably clear: every parent was grateful that their children had an opportunity to study and live in Israel as there is no viable future for Jewish life in the Ukraine.

The distance between Israel and the Crimea is covered in a mere two-hour flight, but for the new immigrant the transition from one reality to another can take a lifetime.

In Israel we were briefed by Jewish Agency officials, who made no attempt to hide the fact that, compared to the challenges of absorption and integration into Israeli society, the aliyah process is the easy part.

And while we heard many encouraging stories from young students from both the FSU and Ethiopia about how initial loneliness eventually gave way to feelings of success and well being, we also heard many heartbreaking stories about those who have fallen between the cracks.

Good intentions notwithstanding, the Ethiopian community in particular, is suffering from the disastrous consequences of dismal absorption experiences.

The practice of placing the children of new immigrants in youth aliyah villages, for example, has had disastrous consequences on the Ethiopian family unit. Alienated youngsters have turned away from parents and grandparents whom they have come to see as primitive.

At the same time, these youngsters struggle with feelings of inferiority as they feel rejected by native-born and westernized Israelis. Increasingly Ethiopian youth are finding solace through substance abuse and identification with Afro-American culture.

Research on the subject supports the anecdotal evidence with dismaying statistics: Only 20 percent of Ethiopian youth write high school leaving exams; 75 percent are streamed into vocational courses and one out of every 10 students drops out altogether.

During a morning devoted to the problems faced by the Ethiopian community, we were encouraged by the words of an articulate young Ethiopian woman, who spoke about her positive absorption experience. But her voice cracked with emotion when she described what it felt like to drive by the Central Bus Station in Tel Aviv where other young Ethiopians of her generation were hanging out, lost and aimless with no purpose and nowhere to go.

Funding cutbacks hurting Jewish Agency programs

Jewish Agency officials told us that the only chance to save the large numbers of Ethiopian youth at risk was through intensive educational and social programs. But the Jewish Agency has been forced to reduce funding to such programs because they are receiving less from North American communities. As long as these budgetary cuts remain in place the chance of such programs being undertaken on a large scale seems unlikely.

On a more positive note, one particular trend that is occurring within Israeli society offers much cause for optimism. While donating to Jewish causes has been seen as primarily a Diaspora responsibility, there is evidence that philanthropy is growing in Israel.

Three years ago, Israeli songwriter, Ehud Manor traveled to the cities of Minsk and Vilnius with a group of young North American Jewish leaders. The experience changed him.

Overwhelmed by the generosity of these North American Jews, who arrived on the doorsteps of elderly Jewish shut-ins with food parcels, American dollars and open hearts in hand, he was moved to join the Jewish Agency's new Israeli division, The Israeli Spirit, and has now become one of its key spokespersons.

The increased Israeli philanthropy is a clear indication that the covenant signed at last November's General Assembly of Jewish Federations in Jerusalem, which emphasized the special responsibility of Jews towards one another, is becoming a reality.

Lena Krichevskaya, who fled what she described as "terrible anti-Semitism in Ukraine," is among 100 workers in Israel's oldest matzah factory, which produces 3,000 tons a year. [UJA Press Service photo]

Israelis and North Americans are both engaged in nothing less than a reshaping of the Zionist dream. The debate over whether one can live a more meaningful Jewish life in Israel or in the Diaspora has given way to a new partnership where both Israel and the Diaspora are joined together in the common goal of maintaining Jewish life around the world.

Family mission 'outstanding'

TORONTO — Forty-seven participants from Ontario and Montreal recently participated in the Family Mission to Israel, co-sponsored by the Jewish Education Council of Montreal (JEC) and Canadian Jewish Congress, (CJC) Ontario region.

The two-week trip left the participants, mostly first-time visitors, with memories that will last until their next visit.

The families took a whirlwind tour of Israel that included sightseeing, camel riding, a boat cruise on the Kinneret, spelunking (cave crawling), exploring ancient Israel, a b'not mitzvah ceremony on Masada, and lots of walking and hiking.

"Carla (18) and Robyn (16) are in love with Israel and plan on going again either to study or travel," said Vicki Lubell of London, Ont., who along with her husband Bruce and two daughters, experienced Israel for the first time. They were also able to visit their daughter Lauren, a student at Hebrew University.

"The group simply could not get enough of Israel, and wanted to make the most of every minute," said Michael Soberman, director of Community Services for Congress' Ontario region and one of the trips organizers.

Ruthie Saragosti, coordinator of the Montreal Israel Experience Office and another of the trip's organizers, said, "They were so much fun to be around. The kids, teenagers, adults and grandparents amazed us with their enthusiasm and their ready-to-try-anything attitude."

Ron Korzinstone of Montreal, called it an "outstanding family experience, one that instills lifelong memories and a deep desire to return." His daughter Carla, and Joelle and Danya Kelenson had their bat mitzvah ceremony on top of Masada.

"This is a special occasion for you and your families," Dr. Rabbi Shimshon Hamerman, scholar-in-residence on the JEC/CJC Family Mission told the group. "You are standing on one of the most historic sites in Judaism during this rite of passage. I am sure you will always treasure this moment as you begin your adult lives."

Gesher Chai, a city-wide program in Montreal, twins Jewish schools here with schools in Israel. A highlight of the program for William Malkinson, was when he and other children on the mission visited Ma'anit school in Beersheva, which is twinned with PALS, his afternoon school in Montreal.

Gad Elbaz, director of the Montreal Israel Experience Centre, said that "this was an incredible experience for these families. The partnership between the Jewish Education Council and Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region added a communal dimension to the program."

Library receives Montgomery collection

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — A large and valuable collection of the works of Lucy Maud Montgomery now resides in the National Library of Canada, thanks to the generosity of Ottawa-area lawyer Ronald Cohen.

A ceremony was recently held in the foyer of the National Library to introduce the collection and thank its donor.

Cohen, chair of the Canadian Broadcast Standards Council, described how he searched around the world, and added to his Montgomery collection over a 15-year period.

"I chased Montgomery's works wherever they could be found: in Canada, in the United States, in England and Scotland, in Oslo, in Seoul, in Tokyo, in Auckland, in Sydney."

He delighted the audience with anecdotes of his various acquisitions, and the story of how he decided to donate the collection to the National Library.

National librarian Marianne Scott, Cohen said, was a dinner guest at his home one evening several years ago. Browsing through the bookshelves, she exclaimed that she must have the Montgomery collection for the library. According to Cohen, from that moment on, his collecting had a sense of purpose.

"My goal in assembling this collection was to locate as many different copies as I could, in the hope that these would some day offer clues to a bibliographer, to scholars, to collectors, to those who treasure these works not only as stories, but also as artifacts. Differences in the presentation of the title page, the binder's cloth, the name of the printer, the typeface in which the printer's notice is set, the copyright date and so on, led to the painstaking gathering of pieces of a puzzle to which, I hope, some scholars will soon turn their attention," said Cohen.

The National Library already had 700 books by Montgomery, but, said Cohen, "this collection was something that only a collector could...put together – the variety of material that it [contains], 15 or 20 copies of one title, all just a little bit different bibliographically. If you are concerned about a book as a publishing artifact, then a collection such as this becomes a bibliographer's dream."

Cohen does not intend to stop with the 300 Montgomery books he has already donated. "I will continue putting things together for them which will be part of this Ronald I. Cohen/Lucy Maud Montgomery Collection," he said.

When asked if he would miss his books, he replied "No, I might have if I had sold them, but the collection is still there and I can go and see them at any time... They are now available, not only for me, but for all those other people who may want to use them for some scholarly approach."

Master of ceremonies, Randall Ware, head of public programs for the National Library, introduced Scott, as well as such dignitaries as Mauril Belanger, MP and parliamentary secretary to Sheila Copps; members of parliament from Prince Edward Island; and the head of several cultural agencies.

CJA figures up slightly

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — With just a few loose ends to tie up in Winnipeg's 1998-99 Combined Jewish Appeal (CJA) campaign, the results are almost identical to last year, says executive director Gerry Koffman

In 1997-98, Koffman reports, the Winnipeg campaign raised $3,050,000. This year, the campaign is up just $3,000. "Last year, we registered one of the single largest increases in recent history."

One difference he noted, was that this year there was a slight shift in contributions from local needs to Israel and overseas needs.

Winnipeg is the only Jewish community in North America that still has a two-line card, which allows donors to designate how much of their contributions they want to go to local institutions and how much overseas. Last year, 70 percent of the money raised was for the local community. This year, the percentage was down to 67 percent.

Part of the reason for the shift, Koffman explains, was that donors were made aware that money going overseas not only goes to Israel, but also to the rescue and resettlement of Jews from the former Soviet Union.

"About 5,000 Jews a month are still coming out," he says. "As the economic and social conditions in the former Soviet Union continue to deteriorate, anti-Semitism is becoming palpable.

Scene in Ottawa

By G.K. SIMCOE

As the Jewish community approaches Passover, children throughout the country are reviewing the Four Questions. For the governing Liberals however, there is only one question currently being studied: To prorogue or not to prorogue?

Parliament is preparing to adjourn for its traditional Easter recess. Normally limited to two working weeks, the Liberals are actively considering a suspension of Parliament that could last well into the fall. There are pluses and minuses associated with this course of action.

On the plus side, the possibility of a full-scale CBC strike means the government will be subject to less criticism than would otherwise be the case.

Second, without question period and the daily scrums, the government can more quietly manage the fallout from the APEC hearings, the social and health-care transfers to the provinces and Bill C-55.

All of these issues and many others, have the capacity for seriously hurting the Liberal government. The temptation to dodge public scrutiny by shutting Parliament down must be attractive.

And, lest we forget, the government has the thinnest of majorities in the House. Committee travel has been cancelled and even ministers are being instructed to remain in Ottawa whenever the House is sitting.

A respite from that kind of pressure would surely be welcome by House Leader, Don Boudria and his deputies.

But the most compelling reason for the government to consider an unscheduled leave of absence is the mounting pressure from its caucus – two-thirds of which comes from Ontario – to free up MPs to assist in the provincial election campaign unofficially under way in Ontario.

The provincial Liberals are in trouble and candidates have begun calling in all of the IOUs owed by federal MPs. With not much to occupy themselves in Ottawa on the backbenches anyway, MPs would like to settle their debts now, before they have to go on the hustings for their preferred candidate in the next leadership race.

Among the minuses, proroguing parliament would be a tacit admission by the government that its agenda is very thin. The health-care budget made a momentary splash but nothing on the horizon passes for new and exciting government initiatives.

But the most worrisome consideration for the Prime Minister's Office would have to be the idle-hands syndrome. With little else to distract them, the caucus murmurs calling for the prime minister to retire might swell beyond control.

Strange, how both the pluses and minuses add up to a leadership race.

Elie Cohen a legendary figure in Israel's Mossad

By ELIAS LEVY
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Elie Cohen, a legendary figure of the Israeli secret service, is one of the great heroes in the turbulent history of the State of Israel.

Born in 1924 in Alexandria, Egypt, to a family that came from the Syrian city of Haleb, Cohen was one of the principal Mossad agents active in the Arab world. His extraordinary accomplishments and courage allowed Israel to thwart the aggressive designs of the autocratic government in Damascus for several years.

Recruited by the Mossad in the late '50s, Cohen left Israel and settled in Buenos Aires under the name of Kamel Taabeth, a prosperous Syrian businessman. When he arrived in Argentina, he established close relations with several Arab entrepreneurs who were living in South America, and he was entirely successful in being accepted by the rich Syrian community in Argentina.

When he arrived in Damascus in January 1960, Cohen/Taabeth had several letters of recommendation. He quickly became the new idol of the Syrian capital. One of his best friends from Buenos Aires, Commander Amin al-Hafez, was slated to become president of Syria a short time later. For awhile, some people even thought Taabeth would be given an important ministerial portfolio, perhaps that of defence.

While conducting his import-export business, Cohen/Taabeth maintained his political contacts. He was frequently invited to visit Syrian military bases and even made a complete tour of the fortifications erected by the Syrian government on the Golan Heights.

The information that he daily sent to Tel Aviv, mainly in Morse code, covered all aspects of Syrian society. He got highly confidential documents out through Europe, in which he described in minute detail troop movement along the border, and specified the positions of tanks that might impede the progress of the Israeli army if there was an armed conflict.

He provided a list of all Syrian pilots, as well as precise sketches of the arms with which their planes were equipped. He also regularly transmitted to the Mossad first-hand information about political life in the Arab world and its centres of military power.

On Jan. 8, 1965, the Syrian intelligence service suddenly burst into his apartment and surprised him in the process of sending a coded message to the Israelis. A military tribunal condemned him to death. Cohen was hanged in the public square in Damascus, amid the cheers of the crowd, on May 18, 1965.

Almost 34 years after the death of Elie Cohen, his brother, Maurice Cohen, three years his junior – he is now 71 – is actively campaigning to have Elie's memory honored.

For several years, Maurice, a former member of Mossad, encoded and decoded messages addressed to and sent by his brother, the spy of Damascus, without knowing the identity of the spy.

For five years, Maurice has been conducting a vigorous international campaign to have the Syrian government return Cohen's remains to to his family for burial in Israel.

Maurice, who has already collected some 35,000 signatures of support, has sent a letter explaining the purpose of his fight to several international figures, among them, U.S. President Bill Clinton, South African archbishop and Nobel Prize winner Desmond Tutu, and former Soviet president Mikhail Gorbachev.

Several religious leaders, including the former Sephardi chief rabbi of Israel, Rabbi Ovadia Yossef, support his cause. Rabbi Yossef sent a personal message to Syrian President Hafez al-Assad last year, urging him to make this humanitarian gesture to the Cohen family.

"It is clear that President al-Assad will not make a political gesture," Cohen told The CJN. "However, we are counting on the support we have received in the Jewish and Christian religious world to have him at least authorize the members of our family to go to Syria to say Kaddish at the grave of our beloved brother, Elie."

Cohen recently spoke to the members of the Montreal Sephardi community during a evening dedicated to the memory of his brother organized by the Cercle des études juives francophones of the Jewish Community Centre, in collaboration with the Canadian Sephardic Federation and the Alliance Israélite Universelle.

Cohen has also begun a campaign of education and sensitization in Israel to have his brother's story become an integral part of the history of Zionism and of the Jewish state.

To sign the petition seeking to have Elie Cohen's remains returned to his family, contact his Internet site at www.elicohen.com.

To contact Maurice Cohen, e-mail mcohen@virtual.co.il or mcohen65@netvision.net.il.

Ottawa's Ecole Maimonides 'the little school that could'

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Ecole Maimonides is determined to overcome adversity and become "the little school that could."

In the past couple of years, the school has twice been struck by arson but has fought back with strength and determination, and a dedicated team of staff and volunteers.

Most of the school's recent fundraising, however, has been directed toward improving its security system, leaving little for education-related expenses, and even less for its scholarship fund. The school's policy of welcoming every student, regardless of his or her ability to pay tuition, has become difficult to implement with such additional expenses.

To overcome this, An Auction of Fine Art was recently held to benefit the Children's Scholarship Foundation of Maimonides School.

"Out of misfortune has come some good. Because of the fire, Maimonides is now a name that people recognize and sympathize with. Several businesses donated refreshments and paper supplies for the event, and many people were involved in planning the evening, who had never been involved before," said Rabbi Yehoshua Botnick, executive administrator of the school.

The evening opened with a viewing and silent auction; then the bidding began. With all of the art donated, no reserve bids were required to cover expenses.

According to Rabbi Botnick, it was a wonderful opportunity for everyone. The public was able to purchase quality art at low prices, and those who donated the art benefit from a tax deduction.

Conspiracy for a New Age

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — New Age mysticism has taken a wild turn to the radical – and loony – right, if the appearance in Toronto of British author David Icke is any indication.

Author of And The Truth Will Set You Free and The Robots Rebellion, Icke recently addressed a session of the Learning Annex in an address that combined elements of The X-Files with even stranger science fiction scenarios.

Icke expanded on his grab-bag New Age philosophy with disturbing references to classic Nazi conspiracy theories. His address focused on a "global elite" that included the House of Windsor, the Rothschild banking family and former U.S. secretary of state Henry Kissinger.

Though he did not refer to Jews specifically in two weekend addresses, attended by 200 and 300 people respectively, Icke has cited The Protocols of the Elders of Zion, a Czarist forgery, as proof of his world conspiracy views. The British periodical, Open Eye, quotes him as asserting that "there is a global Jewish clique" which has "worked to create the First World War, the Russian Revolution and the Second World War."

He has also been quoted as saying the "Mossad [Israel's intelligence agency] is actually the intelligence agency primarily for the Rothschilds, the banking cartel of the global elite."

Icke, a former spokesman for Britain's Green party and a self-proclaimed "son of God," was banned by the party from addressing its 1994 convention because of the anti-Semitic views contained in The Robots Rebellion.

David Sersta, who operates the Learning Annex, monitored Icke's addresses after being notified about his extremist views.

"He is really far-fetched in his philosophy," Sersta said. "He believes a global elite runs the world, and that organization has extra-terrestrial bloodlines.

"He referred to Princess Diana being sacrificed by the House of Windsor, which he described as 'shape-shifting [extra-terrestrial] reptiles.'"

The Rothschilds and Kissinger (who Icke described as a "go-fer" for the global elite), are part of a white Aryan race that controls the world, Sersta reported.

"His focus was on the British aristocracy being shape-shifting reptiles, while U.S. presidents belong to a secret society and are part of the extra-terrestrial global elite," Sersta said.

"You'd have laughed if you were there. You can't take this seriously unless you believe in an extra-terrestrial takeover of the world."

Sersta suggested Icke is popular in the New Age community because of his "entertainment value," although he acknowledged "some people take it seriously."

His inclusion in a Learning Annex program is consistent with the organization's goal of sponsoring entertaining speakers who discuss off-beat topics like angel-reading, psychic readings and personal growth issues, Sersta said.

But Canadian Jewish Congress took his appearance in Toronto more seriously. Keith Landy, chair of Congress' Ontario region, wrote to Sersta on the day of Icke's first appearance to notify him of Icke's past, including the promotion of his book tour by the violently neo-Nazi group, Combat 18.

"Given Icke's alleged connection to the extreme right, and more importantly, his writings of such an extreme anti-Semitic nature, I would ask that the Learning Annex explain their decision to promote his lecture," Landy wrote.

Bernie Farber, executive-director of the Ontario region, pointed out that Nazi-apologist Ernst Zundel authored a book that claims Nazi flying saucers are based in Antarctica. "That didn't make him any less of an anti-Semite," he said.

Sersta said the Congress letter prompted his attendance at the lectures. But because it came so late in the day, he was unable to alter Sersta's speaking schedule, he said.

"I would never bring anybody with any leanings of anti-Semitism or racism," Sersta said.

However, in light of Icke's lecture, "you have nothing to worry about," he added.

According to information received by The CJN, Icke's book, And The Truth Shall Set You Free, was scheduled to be on sale last weekend at the Total Health show at the Canadian National Exhibition. However, when The CJN attempted to inquire about sale of the book at the show, a person who refused to identify herself grew defensive and hung up the phone.

Sukkah balcony decision appealed by league

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A Quebec Superior Court judge erred when he ruled that there was no Jewish religious duty to erect a sukkah on one's balcony, the League for Human Rights of B'nai Brith Canada argues in its appeal of that decision.

The league is appealing the June 5, 1998 decision by Judge André Rochon to impose a permanent injunction preventing a group of Jewish residents of the Le Sanctuaire condominium apartments from erecting sukkot, the temporary huts associated with the seven-day holiday of Sukkot, on their balconies.

The league contends that Rochon "manifestly erred in law by allowing himself to become the arbitrator of religious dogma."

Rochon ruled in favor of the condo co-owners' association, the Syndicat Northcrest, which first went to court before Sukkot, 1997 to seek the injunction. The Syndicat cited "numerous complaints" from residents about the huts, and condo bylaws prohibiting any type of construction on what are considered common areas of the co-ownership.

The league, represented by lawyer Steven Slimovitch, is acting as intervenor in the case. The respondents are Moïse Amselem and his wife Gladys Bouhadana, Miguel Bernfield, Edith Jaul, Antal Klein and Gabriel Fonfeder.

The league says that Rochon committed an error of law when he "entered into the analysis of the religious duty and, in essence, ruled that there was no Jewish religious duty to erect a sukkah hut on one's balcony, and in effect, went beyond examining the religious duty, but more so questioned the very existence thereof…"

The league says Rochon also erred when, in assessing the sincerity of the Jewish group, he "appears to hold that the duty is to construct rather than dwell in a sukkah hut."

The appellant's factum cites a 1985 Supreme Court ruling that "With the Charter [of Rights and Freedoms], it has become the right of every Canadian to work out for himself or herself what his or her religious obligations, if any, should be and it is not for the state to dictate otherwise…"

The Jewish group testified, as did their expert witness Rabbi Moise Ohana, that their religion ("or at minimum, their conception of it") requires them to have a sukkah on their balcony.

The Syndicat, including its expert Barry Levy, a rabbi and dean of religious studies at McGill University, argued that Judaism does not require a sukkah in any specific location, and "its being placed on one's balcony is simply a question of convenience."

Rochon made his mistake when, faced with these two opposing interpretations of Judaism, he "felt that he was obliged to intervene and, in effect, decide what in fact Judaism mandates," according to the factum…

"He ruled that, despite the evidence advanced by the [Jewish group], they misconceived their religious duty and, in effect, misunderstood it."

The league contends that the function of the trial judge was to verify if the group "honestly believed that their religion required" them to have a sukkah on their balcony.

Instead, Rochon sought to determine if their religion requires them to have a sukkah on their balcony.

The league submits that the state, through its judicial arm, must never take on the role of interpreter of religious dogma for three main reasons: it is not in the spirit of the separation of church and state; only a competent religious body should make such interpretations; and such judicial interpretation is "irrelevant."

The charter, it says, "protects not a religious belief per se, but rather one's concept or understanding of one's religious belief."

The league also takes issue with Rochon's decision that freedom of religion under the charter only protects that which is obligatory in one's religion. "Such a view fails to recognize the intrinsically personal nature that is freedom of religion."

The league says Rochon was wrong to conclude that the Jewish group was not sincere in its contention of what their religious obligations are, on the basis that some of them had not in the past erected sukkot at their homes, but rather had gone to the homes of family members who had a sukkah.

Rabbi Ohana had testified that Jews can celebrate the holiday in any sukkah, as long as using it is not an "exceptional chore." The factum states that in the past, going to spend the holiday with family was not a burden for the appellants, but circumstances have since changed and it would now be a burden.

"As explained by Rabbi Ohana, as per Jewish law, to celebrate Sukkot in this fashion would run counter to Jewish law."

In preferring Levy's interpretation of Jewish law, Rochon has rendered a decision that "wholly negates the freedom of religion of the [appellants], and in effect, requires them to practise their religion in a manner which they find repugnant."

The Jewish group of residents is expected to shortly make its own written submission to the Court of Appeal, Slimovitch said. Then, the Syndicat Northcrest has 90 days to respond.

Federation CJA, Centraide redefine their relationship

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Two of the largest fundraising organizations in Montreal, FEDERATION CJA and Centraide, have redefined their relationship for the first time in 25 years.

In exchange for greater Jewish community participation in Centraide's campaign, Centraide has guaranteed that FEDERATION CJA will receive 3.4 percent of its proceeds. The federation will actively encourage Jews to contribute to Centraide, including asking Jewish business owners to set up voluntary employee payroll deduction plans, a major source of Centraide donations.

The 3.4 percent figure was arrived at by using the 1991 census, which found that Jews – as defined by religion – made up that percentage of the population of Greater Montreal (the Island, plus Laval and the South Shore).

In 1998, Centraide raised $33 million, which means the federation will receive about $970,000 this year. Centraide's allocations will be announced in the next six to eight weeks, said its executive director Michèle Thibodeau-DeGuire.

That rate will continue until data on the Jewish population from the 2001 census is made known, usually at least a year after the census is taken.

The prior arrangement, in place since 1974 when the last agreement was drawn up, was also based on a percentage of Centraide's proceeds: about 3.6 percent. But because the amount Centraide has been raising has soared, the actual sum the federation receives will be considerably higher than in the past. Over the past decade, Centraide's proceeds have increased from about $20 million to a record $33 million last year.

Last year, the federation received over $775,000 from Centraide. Traditionally, Centraide has been the second highest contributor to the federation, after the wealthiest Jewish families, and the federation has been the recipient of Centraide's second largest allocation, usually behind Catholic Community Services.

In return in the past, the federation had agreed not to solicit donations to Combined Jewish Appeal in the general community. Both campaigns are run publicly at about the same time, in the fall.

The relationship recognized that many of the federation's constituent agencies are open to the public, on a non-sectarian basis, and that several Centraide-supported agencies are frequented by large numbers of Jews.

Centraide currently supports more than 250 groups and agencies and 33 innovative community projects, affecting 500,000 people.

Centraide collects half of its proceeds through workplace donations, 35 percent from corporate gifts and 15 percent from the general public.

Tagar conference stresses need for Jewish unity

By DAVID ABBOU
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Regardless of any ideological differences, the Jewish people must unite.

This was the message driven home here at the recent North American conference of the student movement, Tagar, a youth wing of the Herut-Likud party.

The conference brought together 40 participants from the United States and Canada for a weekend of discussion, education and fun, with the aim of establishing goals for Tagar.

Students from universities in Cleveland, Columbus and Miami, joined Canadian members from the University of Toronto, Ryerson Polytechnic University, York University, Seneca College and the University of Winnipeg.

The conference began with Shabbat dinner and services, during which members were able to relax and get acquainted.

After dinner, conference participants began to talk about the future of the movement. It was immediately apparent that there were ideological differences among the members about what Tagar's goals should be.

Some members felt that Tagar needs to live up to the historical perspective it once had, as a movement fighting for the State of Israel. Others felt that this image was outdated, and Tagar must modify its image to represent the beliefs all Jews share, no matter where they fall on the political spectrum. This new, broader Tagar would increase membership and participation, they said.

However, the heated discussion clearly demonstrated the love and commitment shared by all the members for Judaism, Zionism and the State of Israel.

On Saturday, all participants worked to hammer out the goals of Tagar. After much deliberation and debate, the objective of the conference was achieved, as traditional ideology was integrated into a modern context, and the goals of Tagar were agreed upon.

The participants stressed that Tagar is an Israel-oriented movement and therefore will always be a Zionist group. The movement's main goal would be to work towards the unity of the Jewish people by advocating for the State of Israel. Priorities outlined to achieve this goal were:

• Though Tagar is not a religious movement by definition, it has a great respect for Jewish tradition, and realizes its importance for the existence of the Jewish people. Tagar will therefore work towards achieving unity with the religious sector.

• Tagar will be pro-active in promoting the State of Israel and the unity of the Jewish people.

• Tagar realizes the importance of the Hebrew language to the Jewish people, and will promote learning the Hebrew language.

The conference also featured three guest speakers, including Harry Wolle, the president of the Toronto Herut-Likud chapter.

Jerry Zeidenberg, who lectures on Ze'ev Jabotinsky, founder of Revisionist Zionism, described Jabotinsky's commitment to achieving his dream of a Jewish state in Israel.

On Sunday morning, the speaker was Mordechai Ronen, who was a member of the liberation group Etzel (Irgun Tzva'i Leumi) when it was instrumental in the fight for the establishment of the State of Israel. He was also on the ship Altalena, which in 1948 carried soldiers and arms to Israel to fight for the cause.

In an incident sparked by differences between Etzel and Haganah leaders, Ronen said, the Altalena was fired upon, and it sank off the coast of Tel Aviv beach. Nineteen Jewish soldiers were killed.

This was, Ronen said, his first time speaking publicly of the tragic event, and he was emotional in stressing that the incident underlines the need for Jewish unity.

Tradition, reality and the dreams of our children

More than most, Pesach is a holiday for the generations, both those of the past and those of the future. The traditions of our grandparents meet the realities of our modern lives, and sometimes, collide with the needs and dreams of our children. Somehow, we must find a way to blend all three.

There is the joke told in different variations about the young bride who, when making her first brisket, cut off the tip. When her husband asked why she did that, she replied that that was what her mother and grandmother said the Halachah demanded. When she asked her great-grandmother, she was told it was "because my roasting pan was too small to hold the whole roast."

That is a lot like many of the Pesach rituals families follow – we follow them, not because there is any particular reason that we know of, but, well, because. My family doesn't eat cabbage because 200 years ago a farmer cut a cabbage with the same knife he had just used for bread. Others don't eat garlic, or insist that if gefilte fish isn't ground by hand, it is just not appropriate for seder use.

We sing the same tunes at the seder that we heard in our childhood, and if for some reason the tune changes, it is jarring, like taking a step and finding not sidewalk but empty space. We are angry at ourselves for feeling so disconcerted, but even angrier that our world has changed.

On the other hand, we may resent the pull of the old ways. It is so much easier to ignore all those seemingly silly customs that have neither a rational basis nor a rational point. It is so much easier to be modern.

We hesitate, often, to include our children. We shoo them out of the way when we prepare for Pesach, forgetting that it is the experience of working side by side with you, observing the mitzvah of removing the chametz, that they will carry with them through their growing up and grown-up years.

The hurrying and planning and shopping and cleaning and organizing, even the exhaustion that is so much a part of Pesach, show them that to us it is important to remember the Exodus from Egypt. It is important to us to share the realization that once we were slaves, once we were oppressed, but now we are free people.

Surely that is why we cling to memories from the past, and do our best to transmit them. We appreciate the fact that we are warm and safe in our homes, that an enemy won't batter down our door to interrupt the seder, that perhaps this year Elijah will come to redeem us all.

From all of us at The CJN a Chag Kosher v'Samayach.

Enjoying vegetarian foods

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Longtime vegetarians Rachelle and David Bronfman have been exploring the health benefits of calcium-rich vegetarian foods.

After more than three years of research, writing, editing and testing recipes, the husband and wife authors published CalciYum (Bromedia Inc., 1998) which contains information on plant-based sources of bone-building calcium and recipes for everything from spreads and dips to desserts.

"Our goal is to teach people how to get their calcium through alternate sources to dairy," says Rachelle. "There are so many high-calcium ingredients in our grocery stores that we pass by simply because we don't realize they contain calcium and more often because people do not know how to cook with them."

CalciYum has a glossary which describes calcium-rich ingredients, numerous cooking tips, nutritional analysis, a calcium table, information on lifestyle factors, osteoporosis, and 120 everyday calcium-rich recipes including lasagna, shepherd's pie, chunky chili, tofu baked beans, spanakopita, and veggie burgers.

David, an investment specialist, says, "My interest in calcium arose through my lactose intolerance, in addition to my environmental, animal ethics and health research." He notes that one in five Caucasians lack the ability to properly digest dairy protein lactose. And for many, dairy products are a common source of allergies.

Rachel, an artist, a former computer skills trainer and entrepreneur, says that when she was pregnant with their first child (they now have two daughters), "I sought adequate plant-derived calcium for myself and the baby during gestation and nursing."

She says a baby uses a mother's calcium supply in utero and when nursing.

She says that "for cultures that observe dietary laws, CalciYum provides creative solutions to restrictions about the issue of mixing meat and dairy."

The Bronfmans have been guests on a number of radio and television shows, have done speaking engagements for groups, and Rachelle gives courses on calcium-rich, vegetarian cooking.

She says the book has become a bestseller in Canada "and we are on the verge of launching the book in the United States."

Israel ambassador David Sultan and his wife Adina enjoy a glass of Carmel Merlot private collection wine from Israel at their official residence in Ottawa.

Food fit for a Sultan

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

No one will dispute that being Israel's ambassador to Canada can be a challenging experience. David Sultan, who has held this post since 1996, when he moved here from a posting in Cairo, relaxes from his hectic schedule by cooking.

He and his wife Adina try to meld the cuisine of Israel with the foodstuffs of Canada.

Sultan told The CJN that he has liked to cook since his student days in Jerusalem.

"I lived in a flat with two other students (both of whom are now also ambassadors), and we were usually too poor to go out to eat," he said. "It was just more convenient to cook."

The household chores were divided up, he explained. One shopped, one cleaned, and he cooked.

He kept up his culinary skills over the years. In fact, he confided, when his two daughters didn't want to eat, "my wife told them that I had cooked, and then they would eat."

While Sultan said that he likes to cook all kinds of foods, his favorite is oriental, such as kubbeh, an elongated hamburger-like Middle Eastern favorite made with minced meat and semolina during the year and with rice during Pesach.

"I find cooking very relaxing when I am tired," he said. "Maybe other people don't, but for me it is."

Sultan has provided these recipes for Pesach. The stuffed vegetables are for Sephardim, who eat rice on Passover.

There are a number of recipes which are acceptable for Passover. One of the special things about the book, Rachelle said, is that it contains recipes that make use of quinoa, the only grain that Ashkenazi Jews can eat on Passover.

The Kashruth Council notes that the quinoa must be made on dedicated production equipment; that is, the company must not produce anything else on the same lines.

QUINOA TABOULI

2 ½ cups cooked quinoa
¼ cup chopped mint
½ cup diced seedless cucumbers
2 cups finely chopped parsley
2 small tomatoes, diced
3 green onions, chopped

Dressing:
3 tbsp. lemon juice
1 tbsp. olive oil
½ tsp. salt
¼ tsp. black pepper

In a bowl, combine quinoa, mint, cucumbers, parsley, tomatoes and onions.

In a small bowl, whisk together the lemon juice, oil, salt and pepper. Pour over salad; toss.

Set aside for 5 to 10 minutes before serving to allow quinoa to absorb seasonings. Serve at room temperature, or refrigerate 1 hour and serve cold. Serves 4 to 6.

How to cook quinoa:

Measure 1¼ cups water for every cup quinoa. Place measured quinoa in a large bowl with plenty of fresh water. "Scrunch" the quinoa in your fingers by repeatedly "grabbing" and releasing it. Discard the discolored water through a fine strainer and repeat until the water comes clean.

Place measured water and quinoa into cooking pot. On stovetop, bring to a full boil, covered, then reduce heat to simmer. Continue simmering for 15 minutes.

Remove from heat, uncover, and allow to cool slightly before serving.

Food Ideas for Passover

Soup is the perfect comfort food

There is something about soup that just makes you feel comforted. Foodland Ontario suggests these two recipes for soups filled with nourishing vegetables.

WINTER VEGETABLE SOUP

1 onion, chopped
2 carrots, peeled and diced
2 beets, peeled and diced
2 cloves garlic, minced
5 cups vegetable or chicken broth
3 medium parsnips, peeled and diced
3 cups chopped green cabbage
½ tsp. dried marjoram leaves
½ tsp. dried thyme leaves
salt and pepper
2 tbsp. chopped fresh parsley

In large saucepan, combine onion, carrots, beets, garlic and broth. Cover and bring to a boil, reduce heat and simmer, covered, 10 minutes.

Add parsnips, cabbage, marjoram and thyme; cook until vegetables are tender, about 15 minutes. Season to taste with salt and pepper. Garnish with parsley. Makes 8 cups.

ONTARIO VEGETABLE BORSCHT

3 unpeeled beets
⅓ cup pareve Passover margarine
1½ cups coarsely chopped onions
1 can (28 oz.) whole tomatoes
4 cups beef stock
5 medium potatoes, peeled
1 tsp. caraway seeds
1 cup coarsely diced carrots
1 cup coarsely diced rutabaga
1 tsp. salt
3 cups finely sliced green cabbage
2 cups finely sliced red cabbage
2 tsp. dried dill weed
salt and pepper

Keeping roots and stems intact, rinse beets thoroughly under running water; set aside.

In Dutch oven or large saucepan, melt half of the margarine over medium heat; cook onions until softened and translucent. Add tomatoes, breaking up with fork. Add stock, beets, 4 of the potatoes and caraway seeds; bring to boil. Reduce heat, cover and simmer until potatoes are tender, about 30 minutes. Remove potatoes to bowl; mash until smooth and set aside. Cook for 15 to 20 minutes longer or until beets are cooked through. Remove beets and place under cold running water; slip off skins. Grate into bowl and set aside.

Return mashed potatoes to pan, stirring until blended. Cut remaining potato into large dice; add to pan along with carrots, rutabaga, grated beets and 1 tsp. salt. Cover and simmer gently until diced vegetables are cooked through, 8 to 10 minutes.

Meanwhile, melt remaining margarine in large skillet. Add green cabbage and cook until color brightens; stir into soup and cook, uncovered, for 3 minutes. Add red cabbage and dill weed to sop; cook for 3 minutes or just until cabbage is tender crisp. Add more salt and pepper to taste if desired. Ladle into warmed soup bowl. Serves 12.

Food Ideas for Passover

Vegetarian cooking can be highly creative

By NANCY WEISBROD
Special to The CJN

When I teach vegetarian cooking, I am inevitably asked by my students, "What do you eat during Passover?" The answer is simple: vegetables, vegetables and more vegetables!

Vegetables and fruits can easily assume the backbone of our Pesach meals. In fact, it can be a highly creative time in the kitchen (what little of it we may have), because the ingredients themselves provide the inspiration.

Imagine lightly steamed fresh asparagus spears drizzled with a little olive oil and a squeeze of lemon juice. Roast new potatoes, in their jackets, with a crumbling of rosemary, several unpeeled garlic cloves, a sprinkling of coarse salt and, again, a few teaspoons of olive oil in a 400 degree oven for around 45 minutes or until potatoes are lightly browned and softened.

Remember that, when you are changing your kitchen over from chometz, of all the items that need to be purchased for the enjoyment of your Passover meals, vegetables and fruits require no distinction. Armed with a bottle of olive oil, balsamic vinegar, coarse (or kosher) salt, and a bit of honey, you can enhance the ever-present splendid elegance and flavor of fresh, in season, produce.

I would like to offer some advice about kitchen equipment for your Pesach meals. Ensure that you have a steaming basket (I prefer metal as opposed to plastic) that opens to fit the bottom of any pot. A baking sheet or a large, low-sided casserole dish is indispensable for roasting a variety of vegetables that can live in your fridge for the eight days and become intentional leftovers. A good pot with a snug fitting lid is essential for soups. Having your cutting and chopping area defined by a small square of plastic or wood is visually limiting and inefficient. Make sure that you have a cutting board that is larger than a postage stamp. Finally, treat yourself to one or two comfortable knives, so that you don't find yourself facing a mound of vegetables to prepare, armed only with a 3-inch paring knife.

Try not to obsess over the absence of animal protein. The following recipes contain some eggs, and you can easily crumble in some feta cheese, grate a little parmesan or tuck in a few slices to make these dishes dairy through the week. The North American diet is referred to as SAD (standard American diet). This acronym is fitting because of our reliance on animal protein, dairy, sugars, and saturated fats. Capitalize on the theme of freedom that Passover offers and become liberated from certain dietary habits that may be destructive. You'll find yourself anticipating mealtime as opposed to grieving over the loss of chametz.

PICKLED TURNIPS

Make this pickle a week before the holiday. It is simple to prepare, requires only a glass jar in which to let the pickles ripen, and the beautiful pink tinge that the beets lend, is its own reward. Neither the turnip nor beet requires cooking.

2 lb. turnips (the smaller, the better)
1 beet, peeled, cut in half and thinly sliced
2 or 3 garlic cloves, peeled and thinly sliced
3½-4 cups water
3-4 tbsp. red or white Passover wine vinegar
1-2 tbsp. of sugar or honey
2½ tbsp. salt

Peel the turnips, cut them in half or quarter them, and put them in a jar layered with the beet and garlic slices. In a pan bring the water, vinegar, sugar or honey, and salt to a boil and stir to dissolve. Pour this pickling liquid over the turnips and let cool before closing the jar. Makes 1 quart.

ROASTED ARTICHOKES WITH GARLIC

This salad is good if made with large artichokes, but if you can find baby artichokes, it's less work to eat and each bite becomes a succulent morsel. I allow 2 halves of a large artichoke or 4-6 baby ones for each serving.

6-8 large or 16-20 baby artichokes
1 lemon or 2 tbsp. vinegar
2-3 tbsp. Passover olive oil
1 head of garlic, with a bit of the papery skin rubbed off but otherwise left intact
2 tsp. coarse salt

Line a baking sheet with parchment paper and preheat the oven to 400 degrees.

To prepare the artichokes, have a large bowl filled with water and the juice of ½ the lemon or vinegar ready. To trim, pare the stalk down to its base and slice the tip end off by about 2 inches, or the thorny tips of the top 2 rows of leaves. With a scissor, cut the thorny tips off of the remaining leaves. Cut the artichoke in half, from base to tip and remove with a spoon the hairy choke and any inner leaves that appear to have a thorny tip. (In baby ones, you barely have to take out any choke.) If they are large, cut them in quarters or sixths and drop the pieces in the bowl or acidulated water. When all are trimmed, drain and scatter them on the baking sheet.

Place the garlic amongst them and drizzle with the oil and sprinkle with the salt. Cover with a sheet of parchment and tin foil and roast covered in the oven for 20 minutes. Remove the cover and finish roasting for a further 20 minutes or until the hearts are tender and the outer leaves are lightly browned and curled.

Serve warm or at room temperature, garnished with a bit of chopped parsley.

ROASTED PORTOBELLO MUSHROOMS

The texture and taste of this dish resembles meat. No matter how many I prepare, there are never any that survive to the next meal. They can be served hot as part of the meal or at room temperature, as a salad.

6 portobello mushrooms
1-2 tbsp. Passover olive oil
1 tsp. coarse salt
1-2 tsp. Passover balsamic vinegar
Salt and pepper to taste
2 tbsp. chopped parsley (optional)

Preheat oven to 375 degrees.

Wash the mushrooms well and trim off the earthy stem by about ½-inch. Slice the mushrooms thickly. Scatter over a parchment lined baking sheet. Drizzle with the oil and sprinkle with the coarse salt.

Roast in the oven for about 20-30 minutes. Sprinkle them with the vinegar, add pepper and a bit of salt, and if serving as a salad, garnish with the chopped parsley.

GREEN PASSOVER MINA

A mina (or maiena in Egypt) is a pie. For Passover, minas are made with matzahs softened with a little vegetable stock as the crust. The pie is delicious when the vegetable mixture is well prepared, plentiful and nicely seasoned. Add 1/2 cup crumbled feta cheese to the vegetable mixture to make this dairy.

4 tbsp. olive oil
2 medium onions, coarsely chopped
2 garlic cloves, peeled and minced
½ lb. mushrooms, washed, trimmed and sliced
1 lb. of spinach, washed and stemmed or 1 bunch of Swiss chard, washed, stems removed and chopped
1 bunch flat-leafed parsley, finely chopped
½ tsp. cinnamon
½ cup walnuts, toasted in a 375 oven for 12 minutes, if possible
1½ cups vegetable stock (or powdered equivalent)
5 eggs
8 matzah squares

To prepare the filling, fry the onions and garlic in 3 tablespoons of the oil. Add the mushrooms and saute over a medium high heat, until they are browned. Add the spinach (or if using Swiss chard, add stems, saute for 1-2 minutes, and then add the leaves) and cover the skillet with lid so that the greens will steam and soften, about 7 minutes.

Take the skillet off the heat, add the walnuts, parsley, and cinnamon, and season well with the salt and pepper. Add 3 of the beaten eggs and mix well.

Preheat the oven to 375 degrees. Oil a shallow 6-8 cup baking dish with the last tablespoon.

For the crust, briefly soak 4 of the matzahs in the stock until well moistened but not falling apart. Place them, in two layers in the baking dish, breaking pieces to fit. Spoon the filling over and top with the remaining 4 soaked matzahs.

Pour the remaining stock over the pie, then pour the last beaten egg over the top. Bake for 30 minutes or until the top is lightly browned. Serves 6.

Food Ideas for Passover

Surviving Pesach in a matzah-free zone

BY EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

For religious reasons, there are those who follow the custom of not combining matzah or matzah meal with any form of liquid for all of Passover. (This includes everything from not baking with matzah meal to not crumbling matzah into your soup, hence the Yiddish term gebruks or breaking).

I decided that this year, I was declaring my kitchen an almost matzah- free zone (with the exception of using enough matzah to say Hamotzi and a few other treats my family can't do without). I know that I'm going to have to do more than just serve meat, potatoes, and macaroons and fruit compote during chol hamo'ed if I want to avoid an all out culinary revolt from my family.

CONFETTI POTATOES
(A great pareve side dish)

12 to 14 small unpeeled red potatoes, boiled and sliced in quarters
12 radishes, sliced
2 bunches green onions, sliced
12 baby carrots, sliced
2 stalks celery, sliced
2 tbsp. fresh parsley, chopped coarsely
2 jalapeno peppers, minced (optional)
2 tbsp. Passover mayonnaise
2 tbsp. Passover Italian salad dressing sugar or sweetener to taste pepper and salt to taste

After the potatoes are cooked, and while they are still warm, slice them and place them in a large bowl. Toss the potato slices in the Italian dressing and let stand. In another bowl, mix together the radishes, green onions, carrots, celery, parsley, and peppers. Add the potatoes and the dressing to the bowl with the vegetables and toss gently. After all the vegetables are mixed add the mayonnaise, sugar and salt and pepper and toss to mix well. Serve warm or cold. Serves 4-6.

TUNA POTATO CHOWDER

2 ½ cup potatoes, diced
2 cups pareve chicken broth
½ cup onions, chopped
¼ tsp. sage
¼ tsp. paprika
¼ tsp. pepper
½ cup carrots, sliced
½ cup celery, sliced
½ cup green pepper, chopped
3 cups skim milk (you can use whole milk)
6 oz. tuna in water, drained and flaked

In a large saucepan, combine 1 cup potatoes, pareve chicken broth and onions. Bring the mixture to a boil. Reduce heat and cover. Simmer for 10 minutes or until the potatoes are tender. Add sage, paprika, and pepper. When the potatoes are soft, mash them very well. Add the remaining potatoes, carrots, green pepper, celery, and milk to mashed potatoes and broth. Bring just to a boil. Then reduce heat and simmer for 15 minutes or until vegetables are tender. Add tuna. Simmer 5 minutes more and serve. Serves 6 to 8.

(You can use a regular chicken broth instead of pareve and a non-dairy creamer instead of the milk if you prefer.)

PASSOVER SALMON QUICHE

15 oz. canned salmon, pink or red
3 eggs
1 cup sour cream
¼ cup Passover mayonnaise
1½ oz. shredded cheddar cheese
1 tbsp. grated onions
¼ tsp. dill
¼ cup almond slivers
¼ cup shredded cheddar cheese

Preheat oven to 325. Prepare a quiche or pie pan with oil or baking spray. Drain the salmon and save the liquid in a measuring cup. Add water to the liquid to make ½ cup. Flake the salmon and remove skin and bones. Mix together the eggs, sour cream, mayonnaise, and salmon liquid. Stir in salmon, ½ cup cheese, onion, and dill. Transfer to baking pan. Sprinkle with ¼ cup cheese and almonds. Bake for 45 minutes, or until quiche is firm in centre. Serves: 6-8

POTATO-TOMATO CHEESE BAKE

2 lbs. russet, or new potatoes
6 tbsp.unsalted butter
½ tsp. salt or more to taste (potatoes absorb salt)
1½ lb. ripe plum tomatoes ground black pepper to taste
1½ tsp. basil, crushed
⅔ lb. mozzarella cheese, sliced
4 eggs, hard cooked
⅔ cup chopped fresh parsley
½ cup fresh-grated Parmesan cheese
3 scallions, chopped

Take a 9 x 13 casserole and grease it with the 2 tbsp. of butter or non-stick spray. Boil (or microwave) the potatoes until they are just barely tender, drain them, peel them and cut them crosswise in fairly thick slices.

Melt the butter and pour 2 tbsp. in the bottom of a 9 x 13 pan. Arrange the potato slices in the casserole in one layer and salt them. Slice the tomatoes and arrange the tomato slices on top of the potatoes. Sprinkle the tomatoes with salt and pepper and the basil. Slice or shred the mozzarella, and arrange the cheese on top of the tomatoes. Peel and coarsely chop the eggs.

Combine them in a bowl with the remaining 4 tbsp. of melted butter, the chopped parsley, the chopped scallions, ½ tsp. salt and some pepper. Toss the mixture together until it is thoroughly mixed. Spread the egg mixture evenly over the cheese. Sprinkle the casserole with the Parmesan cheese and bake it in a preheated oven at 350 for 25-30 minutes (or until the mixture is bubbling and the cheese is lightly browned on top). Let set for 3-4 minutes and serve. Serves 6-8.

POTATO & EGGPLANT LASAGNA

4-5 large potatoes
2-3 cups tomato sauce
2 large eggplants
2 packages frozen spinach, defrosted
2 large onions
2 tsp. garlic, minced

Slice the eggplants thinly and lay them on a cookie sheet. Sprinkle the tops of the slices generously with salt and let sit a minimum of 45 minutes. Drain liquid (the liquid is very bitter and this will give you a sweeter end result). Rinse eggplants to get rid of salt. Slice the potatoes thinly into cold water (so they don't

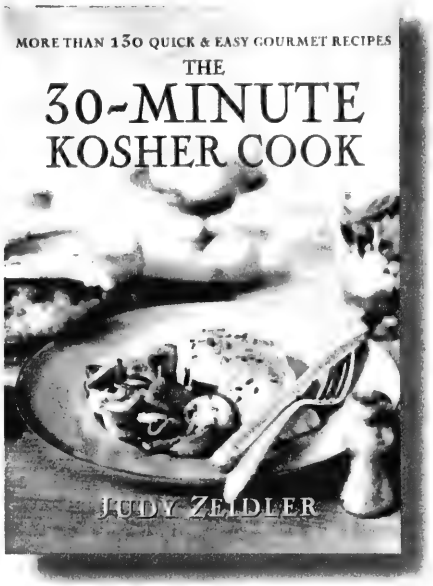
Kosher cookbook 'a lifesaver' for those with busy lifestyles

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter



You know what it's like. You spend all day either at a job, or running after the kids; you get the laundry at least half done, dash out for the tomato sauce you forgot to buy and the milk that you have to replace because the baby spilled it. You do your three car pools for the day, open the door – and you are greeted with "Well, what's for dinner?"

In her introduction to her latest cookbook The 30-Minute Kosher Cook (Morrow, 1999), author, chef and food columnist Judy Zeidler, says that her intention was to produce a cookbook that would be "a lifesaver for anyone who wants to make a delicious meal prepared from fresh ingredients in 30 minutes or less."

She might have added healthy to her goals, as the emphasis is on steaming, broiling and grilling.

Zeidler devotes a whole chapter to tips on organizing your kitchen, freezer and pantry so that you will be prepared for whatever contingencies pop up. These include labor-saving tools and a well stocked larder.

Especially helpful is a list of time-saving techniques, such as always cooking an extra portion of fresh vegetables, to be saved for tomorrow's salad, lining pans with foil, collecting and reading your recipes before starting to cook, and (an unnecessary suggestion for most mothers), learning to do several tasks at once.

All the recipes are kosher, and there is a special chapter at the end with recipes for Shabbat and holidays.

CAULIFLOWER SOUP

2 tbsp. extra-virgin olive oil
1 medium leek or yellow onion, peeled, quartered, and thinly sliced
2 garlic cloves, minced
1 celery stock, thinly sliced
2 carrots, peeled and thinly sliced
1 parsnip, peeled and thinly sliced
1 large cauliflower (1½ lb.), chopped (reserve a handful of florets)
5 cups boiling water salt and black pepper to taste fresh dill sprigs, for garnish

In a large saucepan over medium heat, heat the olive oil and saute the leek, garlic, celery, carrots and parsnip for 5 minutes, stirring constantly with a spoon to avoid browning. Add cauliflower and saute 5 minutes more. Add the boiling water, return to a boil. Cover and lightly simmer 15 minutes, or until the cauliflower is tender. Meanwhile, parboil the reserved florets in boiling water for 5 minutes, keeping them crunchy. Let them cool. Serve as is, or puree in small batches.

To serve, ladle into shallow heated soup bowls and garnish with the reserved whole florets and sprigs of dill. Serves 8.

CANDIED SWEET POTATOES

6 medium sweet potatoes (about 3 lb.)
1 cup apple juice
½ cup brown sugar (if not available for Passover, replace with an additional ½ cup honey)
½ cup honey

Preheat oven to 375. Peel the sweet potatoes and slice them into 1-inch rounds. Place the rounds in a single layer in an ovenproof glass baking dish. Pour in the apple juice; sprinkle evenly with brown sugar, and spoon the honey over the sweet potatoes. Cover with foil and bake for 20-30 minutes, turning after 15 minutes, until the potatoes are soft and glazed. Makes 8 servings.

turn brown). When all the potatoes are sliced, dry them and place them on an oiled baking sheet; brush a light coat of oil over the top of the potato and bake at 400 until the potato slices are lightly crisped. Then, turn them over and cook other side (for low fat, use a cooking spray). Slice the onions and saute them with the garlic in a small amount of oil (or water) until soft. Add spinach and mix well.

Spread a small amount of tomato sauce in the bottom of a lasagna pan (12x9), place a layer of potatoes on top of the sauce then a layer of eggplant, a layer of spinach & onion, and then tomato sauce. Repeat. End with a layer of potato. Brush the top lightly with oil and cook at 350 about 1 hour or until eggplant is soft. Remove from oven and let set 5 minutes before serving. Serves 6 to 8.

PASSOVER CAULIFLOWER KUGEL WITH MUSHROOMS

1 large cauliflower
salt and pepper
3 to 4 tbsp. oil
1 medium onion, chopped
1½ cups mushrooms, quartered
2 large eggs
2 tbsp. crushed potato chips
½ tsp. paprika
⅓ cup coarsely chopped walnuts (optional)

Preheat oven to 375. Divide the cauliflower into medium florets. Cut peel from large stalk and slice stalk. Boil the cauliflower in large saucepan of boiling salted water 8-10 minutes or until stalks are very tender. Drain well and cool. Puree in food processor, leaving a few chunks then transfer everything to a large bowl and set aside.

Heat 2 to 3 tbsp. of oil in medium-sized skillet and add the onion. Saute for 5 minutes. Add mushrooms and saute together over medium heat about 5 minutes or until mushrooms and onions are light brown. Remove from heat.

Add the eggs and potato chips to the cauliflower mixture and mix well. Season the cauliflower mixture with the salt and pepper. Gently stir in the mushroom mixture and any oil in the pan. Oil a shallow 9-in. square baking dish. Spoon in the cauliflower mixture. Sprinkle 1 tbsp. of oil over top. Sprinkle the top with paprika, then with the walnuts. Bake 30 minutes or until set. To serve, cut carefully in squares and run knife around edges. Use spoon to remove portions. Serves 4.

Preheat oven to 375 and grease a 9 x 13 pan. Boil the spaghetti squash for about 45 minutes, until a fork will pierce the flesh easily. Set aside to cool while preparing the cheese mixture.

In a small bowl, combine the raisins, orange juice and orange rind; set aside. In a large mixing bowl, beat the eggs well. Add the sugar, salt and milk. Stir in the cottage cheese and the plumped up raisins with the orange juice and rind. Beat until blended. Set aside.

Food Ideas for Passover

Breakfasts can become a real challenge

BY EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

During Pesach, some chefs agonize over what to serve for seder. Others, less concerned with main meals, worry about how to make lunches and desserts interesting. I never stress out over that kind of stuff. It's a week's worth of breakfasts without bagels that gives me fits.

How will I prepare delicious, nutritious and fun breakfasts that don't take five hours and a dozen eggs? Simple, I'll use the following recipes I've been collecting since last year, and make sure that there is also plenty of yogurt and fresh fruit to round out the most important meal of the day.

PASSOVER BREAKFAST BANANA PANCAKES

3 large eggs
⅓ cup matzah meal
2 tbsp. matzah cake meal
¼ cup regular or low fat sour cream
¼ cup regular or low fat cottage cheese dash of salt
2 very ripe banana chopped
1-2 tsp. vegetable oil (not olive oil)

In a medium bowl, whisk eggs. Whisk in matzah meal, cake meal, sour cream, cottage cheese and salt. Stir in banana. Batter will be very thick. Pour oil onto griddle or large skillet. Heat over moderate heat until hot. Make 3-inch pancakes using about ¼ cup batter for each. Cook until a few bubbles appear on top, and underside is golden, about 3 minutes. Turn and brown on the other side, about 2 minutes. Serve with butter, syrup, jam or anything you like on your pancakes. Yield: 10 pancakes.

PASSOVER CUPCAKE BLINTZES

1 lb. creamed cottage cheese
2 oz. melted butter
¼ cup sugar
½ cup cake meal
4 beaten eggs (can use egg substitute)

Mix together all the ingredients except eggs. Then add the eggs. Grease muffin tins or use paper muffin cups. Fill tins ¾ full; bake 350 for 40-45 minutes if using large muffin tins. Smaller muffin tins will require less time. Serve with sour cream or jelly or fresh sliced strawberries.

APPLE PANCAKES

2 medium apples, peeled and diced
1 large egg
3 tbsp. sugar
½ cup cake meal
¼ cup water
¼ cup oil
pinch salt

In a bowl, beat the eggs, sugar and water together. Add the peeled and diced apples. Add the cake meal and salt; mix well. Heat small amount of oil in pan. Drop mixture into frying pan by tablespoonfuls. Fry until browned on both sides. Makes 4 pancakes. This can be doubled or tripled.

PASSOVER WAFFLES

2 eggs separated
3 tbsp. oil
½ cup buttermilk
¼ cup sugar
⅓ cup cake meal
⅛ cup potato starch

Beat egg whites with an electric beater until soft peaks form. Gradually add sugar and continue beating until stiff peaks, but not dry. Using the same beaters but another bowl beat the egg yolks with the oil until light, about 5 minutes. Add milk, continue beating. Gradually add the dry ingredients. Batter will be thick. Fold in egg whites in two batches. This will make 4 waffles. Pour batter into prepared waffle iron. This batter can also be used for griddle pancakes.

APPLE-BOYSENBERRY BRUNCH CAKE

This is cut and served as you would a cake, but the texture is that of a pudding. Begin the cake a day ahead.

2 cups water
2 cups frozen unsweetened boysenberries or blackberries (about 8 oz.)
1 cup sugar
¼ cup Passover brandy
1 tbsp. fresh lemon juice
4½ lb. golden delicious apples (about 9 medium-large), peeled, cored, each cut into 12 wedges

1 13-ounce Passover sponge cake
2 cups sliced almonds, toasted
12 soft almond macaroons, finely crumbled (about 1 ½ cups)
6 tbsp. (¾ stick) unsalted margarine, melted, cooled
½ cup apricot preserves
2 tbsp. Passover brandy or sweet wine
1 ½ cups chilled whipping cream
3 tbsp. sugar
Additional toasted sliced almonds

Combine first 5 ingredients in heavy large saucepan. Stir over medium heat until sugar dissolves and syrup comes to simmer. Using slotted spoon, transfer berries to small bowl. Add half of apple slices to simmering syrup and cook until tender and just translucent, stirring occasionally, about 12 minutes. Using slotted spoon, transfer apples to sieve set over large bowl. Press apples to extract excess syrup. Reserve syrup. Transfer apples to another bowl. Repeat cooking and draining with remaining apples.

Return berries and drained syrup to same saucepan. Boil syrup until thickened and reduced to 1 ⅔ cups, about 5 minutes. Transfer boysenberry sauce to small bowl. Cover and refrigerate.

Position rack in centre of oven and preheat to 350. Coat 9-inch-diameter springform pan with 2¾-inch-high sides with margarine. Crumble cake onto large baking sheet. Bake until crumbs are dry and just beginning to color, about 15 minutes. Cool. Maintain oven temperature. Finely grind crumbled cake in processor.

Sprinkle ⅓ of cake crumbs in bottom of prepared pan. Sprinkle ⅔ cup almonds over. Sprinkle ⅓ of macaroons over. Top with half of apple slices. Mix apricot preserves and brandy in small bowl. Spread half of apricot mixture over apples. Repeat layering with half of remaining crumbs, almonds, macaroons and margarine. Press top firmly to compact cake.

Place cake on baking sheet. Bake until top is golden and cake just begins to shrink from sides of pan, covering loosely with foil for last 15 minutes if browning too quickly, about 45 minutes. Transfer cake to rack. Press top firmly to compact cake. Cool cake in pan on rack. Cover and chill overnight. (Can be prepared two days ahead.)

Run small sharp knife around sides of pan to loosen cake. Release pan sides. Whip cream and 3 tbsp. sugar to firm peaks. Spread cream over top and sides of cake. Press additional almond slices onto sides of cake. Refrigerate at least 1 hour and up to 4 hours.

Cut cake into wedges. Spoon reserved boysenberry sauce over. Serves 10-12.

Stuffed vegetables

strawberries.

STUFFED VEGETABLES
(For our Sephardi readers)

6 small zucchini
6 small tomatoes
6 small green peppers
1 lb. ground beef
6 oz. pearl rice
salt and pepper to taste
1 cup fresh dill, chopped

Sauce
4 cups chicken broth
5 garlic cloves, crushed
½ cup fresh mint, chopped
1 medium sized lemon, juice only

For zucchini, remove top at stem, and gently cut out centre, lengthwise, leaving about ¼ in. of flesh around the outside.

For tomatoes, remove top and scoop out pulp.

For green peppers, cut off top and remove all seeds.

Prepare stuffing by mixing ground beef with rice, salt, pepper and dill. Stuff vegetable shells with the meat mixture. Arrange stuffed vegetables in 2 layers (peppers and zucchini on bottom, tomatoes on top layer) in a large covered pot.

Pour broth on top of stuffed vegetables. Add garlic, chopped mint, lemon juice. Bring to boil on stovetop, cover and simmer about 40 minutes. Serves 6.

Favorite Passover things

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Cleaning and cooking and so many dishes
Out with the chametz, no pasta, no knishes
Fish that's gefilted, horseradish that stings
These are a few of our Passover things.

Today, a few of my favorite Passover online things.

For an excellent overview of the holiday, start off at the massive Virtual Jerusalem site [http://www.vjholidays.com/pessach/index.htm]. There's the VJ Haggada, insights into freedom, and a large area for kids.

The Orthodox Union site [http://www.ou.org/chagim/pesach/] has an overview of holiday traditions, a selection of audio essays and a copy of OU's 1999 Kosher for Passover Directory.

For something unconventional and thought-provoking, I highly recommend HappyPassover.com [http://happypassover.com]. You will find articles such as Women's Passover Celebrations and Families, Divorce and Passover.

As the poem says, "no pasta, no knishes." Not only do people clean their homes for Passover, but they also sell their chametz to a non-Jew so that they don't own any leavened products during the holiday [http://www.chabad.org/pesach/chomez.html]. If your local synagogue doesn't provide this service, then visit Montreal's Beth Israel Beth Aaron [http://www.shul.org/chometz.htm]. You can fill out their online chametz contract and e-mail it directly to Rabbi Reuben Poupko who will act as your agent in this sale.

Matzah and karpas and chopped-up charoset
Shankbones and Kiddush and Yiddish neuroses
Tante who kvetches and uncle who sings
These are a few of our Passover things.

If you want to prepare gefilte fish and karpas and charoset like bubbie used to make, there's plenty of help online. And if you want to try something a bit daring, there's advice for that too. The Jewish-Food Recipe Archives has a massive Passover section with hundreds of suggestions [http://www.eskimo.com/~jefffree/recipes/homepage.htm]. How about Creole Pot Roast Piquant with Russian Potato and Mushroom Croquettes topped off by Very Fudgy Brownies?

When you've had your fill of chicken and turkey and brisket, you may want to go meatless. Rabbinic Reflections

Parents' responsibility

By RABBI MOSHE STERN

A middle-age man was standing outside the rabbi's office. His eyes were misty, and it appeared he would burst out crying any minute. He was not necessarily looking for advice. He merely wanted to unburden his heart. He approached the rabbi and told him the following tale:

His only child, a son, had married a non-Jewish girl. He seemed puzzled as to how this had occurred, for he had provided his son with a Hebrew school education, and even had a nice bar mitzvah celebration. When he learned that his son was about to marry, the father angrily ordered him out of the house. He had second thoughts, though, and relented, attending his son's wedding, which was performed by a justice of the peace.

The son never forgave his father, however, and deliberately avoided him afterwards. The boy's mother had a heart attack and the boy refused to visit her. When the man called his son to speak to him, his daughter-in-law answered the phone and hung up on him.

The pathetic man stood before the rabbi, wondering, "How did this happen? Didn't I always provide for my son?"

The words came bubbling out, as the man continued his account with a recital of how well he had taken care of his sick wife. "True," he said, "once in a while I cheated on my wife, but that's because she's been sick."

The father had obviously set a poor example for his son to follow, so what could he have expected? He readily admitted not observing any Jewish customs in the home, so when his son asked him, "What's the difference between her home and ours?" he could not answer.

Here is one thought that readily escapes parents: the responsibility of personal example. They feel that their obligation has been fulfilled when their children have been sent to school, even a religious school, but fail to realize that much of the effort of the teachers and rabbis is wasted when the parent sets a poor example at home.

Many of us realize how futile it is to preach to the children regarding the importance of putting on tfillin, for example, when their fathers and even grandfathers ignore this great mitzvah.

How can we tell the children that the much glorified Ten Commandments contain a certain clause which reads, "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy," when they notice the active business their parents indulge in on the Sabbath? It is useless work on the part of the teacher, and it means that a generation has been lost because of the poor example of the parents. Of course, they will become parents one day themselves and set a similar example for their children, and so on.

This means, in effect, that generations of Jews will be lost to the Torah unless a break occurs somewhere in the family.

Many of us parents must realize the tremendous responsibility we have for the future life of the child. "Do as I say, not as I do," is a commonly heard expression of parents to children. This is ridiculous, and parents should realize it, especially these parents who have become so liberal that they sanction interfaith dating with the hope that their child will not fall into an emotional trap and marry.

I will conclude with this saying, "Be careful how you live; you may be the only Bible some people will ever read. Be careful how you teach; you may be the only lesson some people will ever learn."

Rabbi Stern is the spiritual leader of Shaarei Tefillah Congregation in Toronto.

Female rabbis

Books
Bernard Baskin

Women Who Would Be Rabbis*, by Pamela S. Nadell (Oxford, $48).

For a long time women, have wanted to become rabbis. The first to achieve this distinction was Regina Jonas. She graduated from a Berlin Reform rabbinical seminary and was ordained in 1935 in a private ceremony. Although never formally installed as a congregational rabbi, she served as an esteemed religious teacher and carried out duties of "rabbinical spiritual" care in the community. Tragically, she perished in the Holocaust.

In the '20s and '30s, five determined women – learned and capable, and later leaders in the community – attended liberal seminaries but were refused ordination. Those who dared to presume they could overcome the barriers of gender confronted insurmountable obstacles. The men who held the keys to the rabbinate were adamant: Although there were no basic theological objections, the time for women rabbis had not yet arrived.

In 1972, Sally Priesand was ordained as the first woman rabbi from a recognized seminary. Her accomplishment, after many years of scholarly discussion and debate, symbolized the fulfilment of women's emancipation within Reform Judaism.

The Conservative movement was slower in accepting this revolutionary innovation. For several decades, a spirited, sometimes acrimonious, controversy ensued. But the ultimate decision seemed inexorable, despite the pressure of diehard antagonists. In 1985, Amy Eilberg was ordained and admitted into the fellowship of the Rabbinical Assembly.

It has been argued that women rabbis would discourage men from involvement in Jewish religious life. But a well-known Conservative rabbi has written, "History testifies that men did not leave medicine or law or politics when women entered these professions. Men did not lose interest in politics when women received their suffrage in 1920. The bat mitzvah did not eliminate the significance of the bar mitzvah. The admission of women to the boards of directors of congregations with voice and vote did not render those councils effete."

Indeed, many have emphasized the importance of wives and mothers in bringing husbands and children into the orbit and activities of the synagogue. Undoubtedly, the growing number of women rabbis adds a new dimension of interest, vitality and emphasis to congregational and communal life.

Pamela Nadell, director of the Jewish Studies program at American University in Washington, D.C., conveys much well-researched information in an articulate and precise manner.

Voices of the Matriarchs*, by Chava Weissler (Oxford, $45.95).

Tchines are Yiddish prayers of devotion or supplication. During the late Middle Ages and into relatively modern times they were recited by women in Russia, Poland, Germany and other Ashkenazi centres.

Often, they were published in small booklets for synagogue use, but actually they were much wider in their spiritual scope. They included prayers for honoring the dead, baking challah and performing other household duties, for infertility, pregnancy, children's safety, entering a mikvah.

Although many of these utterances were simple and naive, others were quite sophisticated and exhibited familiarity with biblical texts, Halachah, midrash, and various sorts of kabbalistic literature.

As they recited tchines, "generations of unknown Jewish women sanctified their daily acts and roles, and at the same time transcended them. In this way, Ashkenazi Jewish women, hampered perhaps by the constraints of their social roles and lack of education, managed nonetheless to create a rich array of visions of the religious life."

Through her study of this little known genre of literature, the author, a professor of religious studies at Lehigh University, opens a hitherto closed window into women's lives, beliefs, devotion and relationship to God.

Don't buy cosmetics without reading this book

By ANITA SZABADI-GOTTESMAN

When I got the call from author and makeup guru Paula Begoun's Canadian press agent telling me I could sit down with her and hear the straight talk on makeup, I was really excited.

I have followed Begoun's advice from one of her previous books, Blue Eyeshadow Should Absolutely Be Illegal, and I had the chance to preview her newest book, Don't Go to the Cosmetics Counter Without Me, newly packaged and updated in it's fourth edition.

I skipped the introduction and acknowledgment sections and flipped to the meat of the book. Over 180 lines of makeup are rated in alphabetical order by manufacturer and category of product. Each product is described by function (i.e., foundation, moisturizer, mascara) and listed with its price. A brief description of each product is included and then an easy rating system of a happy face for a highly rated product that is a good buy, an expressionless happy face for a product that's just okay and a frowning happy face for a product to stay away from.

"Price still has nothing to do with quality," Begoun writes, "and this is more true now than ever before."

With a sigh of relief, I find that all the products I use have come up with a happy face except for one (my favorite) which has a stoic happy face beside it. I think I'm okay to sit down with Begoun.

The reviews in the book are clear and concise, cut to the chase through the many mediocre products available in the marketplace, and define the ones that actually perform and are worth the money. The reviews help make sense of the vague language used by most companies and teach consumers how to read and understand the only regulated part of a cosmetic, the ingredient list (not yet compulsory in Canada, a point of contention for Begoun).

"Any woman who has ever been disappointed at the cosmetic counter should refer to my book," says Begoun unabashedly, "Women tend to blame themselves when a product doesn't do what it says it will do, and they tell me all the time that they thought it was them before they read the book."

I challenge her claims and say that with a little common sense, a woman should be able to make the right choices.

Begoun says a consumer cannot possibly sort through all the combinations of ingredients that make up every product, understand their meaning and make sure the product's claims will be fulfilled.

With a background in chemistry, Begoun works with documentation from government agencies such as the U.S. Food and Drug Administration and Health Canada, and she and the three members of her research staff test every one of the thousands of products evaluated.

She interprets the formulations on the ingredient list of each product and then, she says, "I tell you things you might want to know."

For example, when a company claims their mascara doesn't smear, it shouldn't; if they say their lipstick lasts all day, it should; if a wrinkle cream is supposed to remove wrinkles, then it better remove them.

Happy face

Begoun stresses that the worst place to go for advice on makeup is to the salesgirl standing behind the counter. Begoun says they don't know what they are talking about.

"Cosmetics salespeople have been taught how to sell," she stresses. "They are not familiar with the ingredients of their product lines and constantly give out misinformation."

She also says women are seduced by fashion magazines and the information they give out. How magazines address makeup issues is directly related to the product advertising in their pages.

"It is important to get good information that is not generated by the cosmetics industry itself," says Begoun.

As for trends in makeup for this season, Begoun feels that too many women waste their time and money following trends.

"It is not a problem to stay current and classic," she says. "Makeup should be applied properly and not by following trends – makeup must empower women, not make them look silly."

To keep women as current as possible, Begoun has launched a monthly newsletter now in circulation to 10,000 readers. She welcomes e-mail and letters from consumers and answers all her mail personally. She is constantly updating her Web site at www.cosmeticscop.com.

Don't go to the Cosmetics Counter Without Me (4th Edition) Paula Begoun, $26.95 is available at all major bookstores.

Permanent makeup is a painless procedure

By CAROL WISE
Special to The CJN

Aside from the purely cosmetic aspect, micro-pigment implantation is a procedure that corrects flaws in the skin. These include port wine stains, discoloration and scar tissue, just to name a few.

It is great for alopecia (a condition that causes loss of hair) sufferers and is considered a fashion diva's new best friend.

Working as a makeup artist myself, applying makeup to over 10,000 faces over the past few decades, this concept totally intrigued me.

When I began my inquiry, I had the good fortune to meet Dorothy Kiroff, proprietor of Permanent Makeup Artistry (113 Yorkville Ave.). Kiroff's years of experience and great reputation have propelled her into the forefront of the permanent makeup industry.

Noted also for her excellent camouflage procedure, she is no stranger to the medical community. Her diploma certificates and achievement awards blanket the wall of her procedure room and attest to her expertise in the arena of micro-pigmentation.

The permanent makeup choices are usually for lips, eyeliner and eyebrows, with the latter being the most popular choice. I decided that, indeed, it might be great to say goodbye to my eyebrow pencil forever. Being a little skeptical, and having a pain tolerance that reads zero, I set forth to find out everything about this procedure.

What is this? I asked, and Kiroff explained that micro-pigment implantation involves implanting colored mineral pigment under the top layer of skin. Sterilized disposable needles implant hundreds of tiny dots to achieve the desired results. "The art really lies in the mathematics," says Kiroff, who actually measures the face before she begins the art work.

It all sounded so easy, but I still had the prime question to ask. "Does it hurt?"

"No," she answered. "I freeze the area with a local anesthetic used frequently by dentists, and most clients are quite comfortable."

How long does it take and how long does it last?

"Most procedures take two-to-three hours and last five years or longer," she said.

She's careful that no problems occur during the procedure."I work closely with my client, trying to understand the results they are looking for. I spot test for allergies, and generally everything goes perfectly."

I decided to book an appointment and pencil in my brows for the last time. She immediately began measuring my forehead, and drew lines and Xs around my eye area to create a new balance. It became clearly apparent there was more than the art of makeup involved; this technique was, in fact, very scientific.

The art work began when Kiroff sketched my brows into a perfect shape and I immediately agreed they did give my face a better balance.

We discussed color, and in minutes, a gorgeous shade was created. The freezing was injected around my brows, and I must admit that it did hurt, but just for a few seconds, after which it was clear sailing.

"It's not just implanting color into the skin – achieving a natural look is what is essential," she said. As promised, the procedure was over in two-and-a-half hours.

It took about a week to completely heal and my brows have never looked better; they are perfectly shaped, a great color and look really natural.

Spring Fashion

Beauty Shop

By Carol Wise

The spring collection depicts a new age of ultra-femininity. Romance is in the air and feminist changes to feminine.

A halo of shimmer covers eyeshades of purple, pink and nursery blue. Fashion is sheer and worn in slinky layers of chiffon and mesh. Lips are painted in mischievous shades like Cupid and Passionate Rose from Dior and nails shine with a naked freshness.

Lighten up your skin care regime – change rich creams to lotions. Treat yourself to a professional facial to rid your skin of dead cells from the cold winter months. Actually, turning your bathroom into a spa for a night can bring similar results. Invite a girlfriend or special guy and have some fun.

To help you achieve your beauty goal this spring, begin an exercise routine, eat a low fat, low sugar diet, and supplement with a multiple vitamin. Remember the essence of looking good is being healthy.

CAROL'S TIPS

Skin Care: Nothing is more important than your skin. If you're on a budget, spend your money here, and if you have no budget, go for the Crisco. Biotherm's Aquasource is a hydrating, skin-quenching experience. This icy gel claims to provide the revitalizing benefits of 5,000 litres of spa water. I keep mine in the fridge for extra oomph.

Protect skin from free radical damage with Clinique's latest cream, New Weather Everything SPF15; it's as rich as Crisco, but penetrates and feels much better.

Research in neuro-cosmetics has resulted in Lancome offering HydraZen, a skin de-stressing moisturizer containing an exclusive complex called Acticalm. It soothes and deeply moisturizes skin. Two textures are available, a soft cream and a cool lotion.

La Prairie introduces a lifting and firming cream called Skin Caviar Luxe. Made from rare Caviar Extracts, AHAs and unique Sea Proteins, it's a decadent blend with a decadent price – my advice is get a sample.

The star of the vitamin cream this season is Vitalmine, from Christian Dior; it claims that the dynamic duo of Vitamin C and ATP (Adenosine Triphosphate – a combustible used by all cells) is energy boosting and creates increased vitality for cells.

Biotherm Homme has developed two new products to give your man healthier skin: a detoxifying cleanser with five fruit acids to remove dead skin cells and impurities, as well as an oil-free moisturizing gel which contains two active detoxifiers and AHAs to encourage cell growth. Treat your special guy; he'll love it and let's face it – what feels better than a fellow with soft skin?

Foundation: If foundation is too sheer, what is the point? We all need a little coverage. Try Amazing Lasting Sheer Makeup by Almay; it's a light cover and waterproof, and comes in four made-for-you shades.

Baby Boomers, listen up, Lancome's new anti-aging Teint Optimage is a silky liquid that glides over the fine lines without accentuating them and smooths out skin tone.

Also from Lancome, Palette Mix includes light, medium and dark hues in one handy compact. It's fabulous for a touch up, cover up and full coverage – and the best travel companion.

SmartWear Makeup SPF 15 by Elizabeth Arden, not only delivers radiant, lasting all day coverage, but sun and environmental protection as well.

Chanel unveils a gorgeous silky powder in a shaker bottle; the surprise is an integrated brush – imagine, loose powder that travels.

Sweet Cheeks: Never mind these bland, pale faced people we see all too often in our treasured fashion mags; put on a little blush, we all need it. Lancome's Blush Duo provides color in two textures, a cream that turns to powder and a silky powder with an iridescent glow – a great combo for day or night.

Estee Lauder's Minute Blush is a cream stick blush resembling a thick lipstick. It's so natural the color becomes one with your cheeks, and the best is, it's so easy to apply, you don't even need a mirror.

Eyes: Color is what's happening this spring, so set those boring brown shades aside and have some fun. Try L'Oreal eye Highlighter – use as a liner or a shadow. The flirtiest lashes in town are yours from Maybelline's Wonder Curl mascara. You girls on the run, put your name on Lancome's Eyeshadow pencil and artliner – colors are dreamy and so simple to apply. Also from Lancome this season are triple shadow compacts with not only three shades but three textures.

Have fun with Elizabeth Arden's Color Jumpers, a unique two-sided product with a matte cream shadow for shading and the "jump" side for sparkle. Colors like Jumping Bean and Jump Shot Slate are hot.

Stormy eyes smolder with neutral shadows from Revlon's Sand Storm series contrasted by Estee Lauder's exotic Go Tropic collection. Luscious shadow shades like amesthyst and bold pink are available in handy two-in-one compacts. Check out the DuoSticks – two-sided thick pencils in yummy colors like pale pink and cool lilac. Add a splash of color with Lauder's turquoise eye defining pencil.

Dior's lids are adorned with bold candy shades of Pinkmania, Blue Aqua and Dizzy Green. Chanel's spring shadows are softly muted hues of green, pale pink and peachy orange – sheer elegance!

Lips: L'Oreal has invented weightless lip color: Rouge Virtuale – great coverage, no caking and long wear. Exceptional lipsticks, from Elizabeth Arden are sheer, see-through and hot off the runways of Paris and Milan. It seems like Dior-ever lipstick from Dior does stay on forever, and the colors are divine.

Images host is an ordinary mom

Taping schedule doesn't interfere with family or religious life

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Adrienne Gold, chases Jackson, her 3-year-son, down the corridor of the Toronto Heschel School. She has just finished car pool and she wants to attend morning services at the school.

But Jackson is running in the opposite direction of the sanctuary. Morning prayers are clearly not on his list of things to do this Monday morning.

As for Gold, her other plans for the day figure more in the realm of the mundane – grocery shopping, laundry, dinner preparations and back to school for car pool – with Jackson in tow of course.

Sounds like the typical routine of a stay-at-home mother…but there's a twist. Gold, 40, is the host of a national television show broadcast twice a day on the Life Network.

Images with Adrienne Gold, a show about fashion and beauty, airs Monday to Friday, 11:30 a.m. and 5:30 p.m. in Toronto, and at different times in other parts of the country.

The show, which debuted in September, is garnering 240,000 viewers a week, which by Canadian standards is a hit, Gold notes in a recent telephone interview held in the evening, after Tyler, 7, and Jackson are tucked into bed.

So how does this mother of two get to parent full time most days and host a daily show?

Three days a week, you'll find Gold at home with Jackson. But on Thursday and Friday she takes him to nursery school and heads downtown to the studio. The five weekly episodes of Images are all taped over two days.

When Gold was first offered the show last summer she instantly turned it down, because she thought it would interfere with her family life. She had been at home with her older son and wanted to do the same with Jackson, she explains.

"I was not prepared to compromise my family life to do this show because it's my number 1 priority."

Gold, who describes herself as a "serious Jew," also told producers she could not work on Shabbat or the holidays.

Not only did the producers come up with a two-day shooting schedule, they also guaranteed that Gold would be out of the studio two hours before sundown on Fridays.

"I'm probably the only person on TV with a shomer Shabbat clause in the contract," she says with a laugh.

Her congeniality, loquaciousness and quick humor, hallmarks of her style as television host, are easily detectable over the phone. But she insists there's no television persona. "I get paid to be myself. I am totally and utterly myself."

Adrienne Gold gets ready for her show.

And while Images features the usual fashion and beauty items like makeovers, beauty advice, interviews with Canadian designers and fashion shows, it is permeated with Gold's playful banter with guests and her direct style peppered with Yiddishisms and humor.

"I am saying things that the viewers are thinking, but that are unsaid in Television Land," Gold says. "The mail I get is always the same thing. 'You're a breath of fresh air. It's like being at a girlfriend's house.'"

She says her "mandate is to help women define their own style," but she stresses that inner beauty is an important element of the show.

"If you're dealing with fashion and beauty as I am, the key is to empower women…Image is based on things other than their weight, their clothes and their makeup.

Adrienne Gold models a vintage faux leopard jacket.

"For every time we show a dress or every beauty makeover, I try to balance that representation with a rant that I do at the end of every show, which tries to make these things relevant on a social and spiritual level."

She describes Images as "extremely proactive…We consistently have plus-size models, so that women of all sizes are represented, as well as models of all ethnic backgrounds." This is her vision and that of her producer, Krysta Look, who, she says is "phenomenal."

She says her looks are "a real advantage" to hosting Images. "I'm not terribly beautiful…I look like everyone else," and that makes her "less intimidating" and more credible to the viewer.

Indeed, Gold says that when she first went on the air as stylist for CityLine, her unconventional looks and honest approach made her stand out. "Suddenly there was this straight-shooting, straight-talking Jewish girl. I was a novelty."

And while she says she recognizes the limitations of fashion and beauty, she has always enjoyed them, working as a management consultant in the fashion industry for many years before going into television, which, she says, was purely accidental.

She replaced somebody on a CityLine fashion segment eight years ago. "I loved it. And I was good at it. I believe I was good at it because I have never defined myself by my appearance. I am strictly a verbal person. I'm all about language."

CityLine asked her to come back and she became a regular guest; later she did weekly segments on Eye on Toronto and the Dini Petty Show.

Gold says she is thrilled to be hosting Images. "I'm really blessed. You cannot imagine what it's like to turn 40 with two children, happily married, with a fulfilling spiritual life. And to have the show happen, it's a mechayeh."

Throw away your glasses

By CAROL WISE
Special to the CJN

After wearing glasses for many years, I never imagined, not even in my dreams, I would be able to see without them.

On Feb. 13, 1999, I had a procedure called LASIK performed by Dr. Sheldon Herzig at the Herzig Eye Institute. Having clear vision again is like a wonderment – a freedom I never thought possible.

Before making this decision, I wanted to find out every detail about this controversial refractive eye surgery. Most vision problems like nearsightedness (myopia), and farsightedness (hyperopia), are caused by your eyes' inability to bend or refract light.

Imagine your eye is like a camera. The cornea and crystalline lens at the front of the eye act as the focusing system, sending light to the retina which acts as the film. When your eye is not focusing light precisely on the retina, blurred vision occurs.

Traditional methods of correcting these problems are, of course, glasses and contact lenses to help your eyes focus light. Refractive eye surgery basically takes the curve from your contact or glasses prescription, and puts it onto the surface of your cornea.

The most popular methods of surgery are PRK (photo-refractive keratectomy) and LASIK (laser-in-situ keratomileusis). PRK removes the outer protective layer of the cornea (epithelium). Cool laser light is then applied to the surface of the cornea to reshape it, a soft bandage is applied, and after three to five days is removed, as a new epithelium grows.

LASIK creates a microscopic flap (as slender as a strand of hair), to lift the outer layer of the cornea. Computer-controlled pulses of cool laser light are applied to the inner layers of the cornea to reshape it. The flap is closed, and heals naturally within 48 hours.

Both procedures are done with local anesthetic and take less then 10 minutes. There is no pain during surgery, but there is some discomfort following.

Some surgeons still prefer to do PRK because the technique is easier to perform. However LASIK, the newer and more advanced method, has a few advantages. There is less pain afterwards (because the epithelium is not removed), less post-op care, less risk of infection and vision returns to normal faster.

The first laser refractive surgery was done in 1987 and it is reported that the patient is still enjoying excellent vision. However, slight regression can occur in the short term, but can usually be corrected with a minor enhancement procedure.

Although recently LASIK has had some bad press, fewer than one percent of cases have resulted in complications. Corneal scarring can occur from severe eye infection, but this can usually be corrected. Night glare is also a problem but improves in most patients.

The College of Physicians and Surgeons of British Columbia recently reported about "the sands of Sahara syndrome," which is an inflammation underneath the flap of the cornea raised in the LASIK procedure.

The cause is strongly suspected to be a toxin from deposits that can form on the lining of pipes in sterilization systems. Herzig said that in the 8,000 LASIK procedures he has done, he has seen this occur once and the symptoms were alleviated with the simple administration of drops.

From my own experience, I can say that within 24 hours, my vision was better than it had ever been. The surgery was painless and the recovery easy.

The most important decision you will make is choosing the doctor. Be careful; there are many clinics popping up with bargain basement prices. The general price is between $2,000 and $2,700 per eye. If ever there was credence to the saying "You get what you pay for," it is here.

Remember, to a great extent, the quality of your life depends on your vision; just imagine skiing, swimming or simply setting your alarm clock without your glasses – it is a miracle.

Israel warns Lebanon after bombs found in village

By AMOS HAREL
Ha'aretz Military Correspondent

JERUSALEM — Israel warned the Lebanese government last week that its refusal to recognize recent violations of the Grapes of Wrath understandings "could bring the system of understandings to an end."

The international committee assigned to monitor the 1996 U.S.-brokered understandings plans to meet again today in Nakura, after failing to make any progress last Friday.

Israel asked that the monitoring committee be convened after IDF and South Labanon Army (SLA) troops last week discovered six bombs planted by the Hezbollah in the village of Arnoun on the eastern border of the security zone.

According to the understandings, Israel and the Hezbollah are to refrain from attacking civilians and from using civilian areas to attack military targets.

After discovering the explosives in Arnoun, Israel charged that Hezbollah was exploiting the situation in the village to smuggle weapons and mount attacks against the IDF. Defence sources in Israel view Arnoun as a test case proving that the Hezbollah continues to operate in areas under the control of the Lebanese government.

The controversy over Arnoun erupted last month after Israel erected a fence that blocked access to the village from outside the security zone.

Lebanon complained that Israel's action was an attempt to annex the village, while Israel countered that the village has always been part of its security zone. Hundreds of Lebanese students mounted a demonstration in the village and broke through the fence. The IDF chose not to interfere.

Following the successful demonstration, Lebanese citizens returned and took up residence in the village after an absence of many years. Lebanese Prime Minister Salim El-Hoss paid a visit to the liberated village. As a result, the status of the village is not clear, but the IDF still enters Arnoun when escorting convoys to the Beaufort outpost.

During the meetings in Nakura on Friday, the Lebanese delegation refused to accept the documented evidence of the bombs that Israel presented.

According to Israeli defence sources: "Lebanon's behavior seriously damages the committee's function. It threatens to turn the Arnoun incident into an episode marking the end of the Grapes of Wrath understandings. If this happens, the full responsibility will lie on the shoulders of the Lebanese government."

Defence Minister Moshe Arens has expressed reservations about the Grapes of Wrath understandings on several occasions, citing their "serious limitations, which restrict the capabilities of the IDF." He noted, however, that "abandoning the understandings, which is an agreement with an international connotation, is not a simple matter."

The IDF bombed Hezbollah targets in the Sujud region north of the security zone on Friday. Two SLA soldiers were slightly injured Friday night when a bomb exploded near Jezzine.

Iraq seeks suicide pilots

By DOUGLAS DAVIS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LONDON — Plans by Saddam Hussein to assemble a group of 60 suicide pilots to attack U.S. and British military targets are being hampered by the Iraqi leader's inability to trust the volunteers to carry out their missions, according to reports from western intelligence sources in London.

Saddam has appealed for volunteers from the Iraqi armed forces to form a suicide air attack force that would be intended both to lure American and British warplanes into Iraq's air defence traps and also to launch direct attacks on western targets in the Gulf region, the reports say.

In effect, Saddam wants the pilots to offer themselves as bait, tempting U.S. and British aircraft patrolling the no-fly zones to give chase.

The Iraqi planes have little chance of evading the superior western aircraft, but their purpose is to entice their pursuers into the air-defence traps, several of which have been set up inside Iraq with the assistance of Russian experts.

Although it has not achieved much success so far, the Iraqi air-defence capability is regarded as substantial, having a battery of some 150 Russian-made surface-to-air missiles.

Israel Election Notebook
May 17

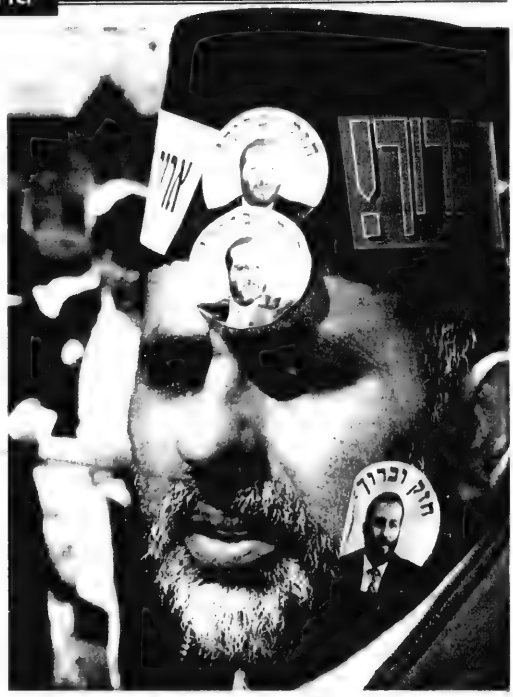
• A clear-cut right-wing ideological coalition has emerged for the electorate as a result of the decision to join forces by Benny Begin, who split from the Likud party, Rehavam Ze'evi of the Moledet party and Zvi Hendel and Hanan Porat of the T'kumah party, both formerly of the National Religious Party.

• Labor party leader Ehud Barak lashed out at his accusers after a state report cleared him of any blame stemming from a 1992 army training accident that killed five army commandos. "I have no use for apologies from cynical politicians who think the blood of Israeli soldiers" can be used for "political mud-slinging," Barak said. During the election campaign, political opponents have accused Barak, the army chief of staff at the time of the accident, of leaving the scene without attempting to help the wounded.

• The centrist party unveiled its line-up for the elections. Uri Savir, one of the architects of the Oslo accords, received the fifth spot behind party founders, Yitzhak Mordechai, Amnon Lipkin-Shahak, Dan Meridor and Roni Milo. Yitzhak Rabin's daughter Dalia Rabin-Philosof was given the sixth slot followed by Nechama Ronen, a former Environment Ministry official linked to the right-wing party Tsomet.

• Ha'aretz reported that after the Jerusalem District Court pronounced Shas leader, Aryeh Deri, guilty of bribery and fraud, Interior and Religious Affairs Minister Eliyahu Suissa vowed to make the trial a centre-piece of the party's election campaign. "If we are suffering, at least we can benefit from it."

Suissa also charged that the timing of the judgment, two months prior to the election, was intentionally aimed at hurting Shas.



NO DOUBT ON DERI

Israel, Ukraine sign pact hatred of Jews will never stop at only Jews," he was quoted by the Interfax agency as saying.

Earlier in Kiev, Netanyahu attended a memorial ceremony for Jewish victims of the Holocaust. "I swear here, on the earth of Babi Yar, that our people shall never be defenceless again," the prime minister said. "The memory of the victims lives in Jerusalem forever."

Surrounded by hundreds of Ukrainian Jews, Netanyahu laid a wreath at the base of a menorah-shaped monument at snow-covered Babi Yar, a ravine where Nazi forces killed more than 33,000 Jews during a two-day period in 1941. Overall, about 100,000 people, most of them Jews, were killed at Babi Yar during World War II.

Kuchma promised Netanyahu that Ukraine would continue to guarantee the rights of its Jewish minority. About 500,000 Jews currently live in Ukraine.

Meanwhile, two Israeli Jewish Agency emissaries have been expelled by the Ukrainian authorities. One emissary was accused of organizing a group of Jewish scientists to emigrate to Israel. Some of the scientists hold positions involving classified or sensitive work, and the authorities viewed the Israeli activity as an attempt to smuggle information from Ukraine to Israel.

March 15

• Hundreds of Bedouin fled into Israel from Egypt to escape a tribal feud, according to the IDF. The IDF is providing humanitarian aid to the Bedouin, who want to remain in Israel. (The Supreme Court ruled later in the week that the Bedouin can remain in Israel until a court hears their request for asylum. The Negev regional council had asked the army to send the Bedouin back to Egypt, citing lack of resources to care for them.)

March 16

• Israeli officials informed their Jordanian counterparts that they are reducing water supplies to Jordan by 60 percent due to a regional drought. Jordan criticized the decision. (Jordan's parliament rejected a motion later in the week to cancel its 1994 peace treaty with Israel to protest Israel's water decision.)

March 17

• U.S. Middle East envoy Dennis Ross told Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat that the United States opposes Arafat's threat to unilaterally declare statehood after May 4. Ross made his comments in Madrid where he met with Arafat.

March 18

• Walid Mansour, Israel's consul general in Bombay was named ambassador to Vietnam. Mansour is the first Druze to hold such a position. The first Arab to hold an ambassadorial post, Ali Yihye, recently concluded his tenure in Finland.

• Police arrested a Beersheva man, Yehonatan Ben Yishai, suspected of planning to bomb the mosques on the Temple Mount in Jerusalem. Ben Yishai was said not to be linked to any extremist groups.

March 19

• In a rare move, El Al announced it had cancelled a flight to Turkey because of a credible warning about a possible terrorist attack on the passengers.

• Water commissioner Meir Ben Meir has recommended to the government that water for farmers be cut by 40 percent due to the shortfall in rain that fell this past winter.

Argentine bombing victims remembered

By SERGIO KIERNAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

BUENOS AIRES — The ceremony has become all too familiar: Kaddish was intoned, bells were tolled and the list of victims' names was read aloud.

For the seventh time, relatives of the victims joined local Jewish officials to mark the anniversary of the March 17, 1992 bombing of the Israeli Embassy in the Argentine capital.

And in another familiar act each anniversary, calls came from Jewish officials in Israel and abroad to find those responsible for the bombing.

The commemoration took place as the Argentine Supreme Court, which is in charge of the investigation into the blast and has been the target of repeated criticisms for its slow handling of the case, was preparing to announce that it is going to exonerate four suspects.

According to sources close to the tribunal, the court will clear four Pakistanis who were briefly arrested days after the bombing, but were freed more than six years ago after undergoing interrogation.

The court also plans to revise the bombing's death toll to 22 from the 29 reported in the immediate aftermath of the bombing.

As he has done in the past, Israel's ambassador to Argentina blasted the court, along with local police, at last week's commemoration.

Surrounded by some of the heaviest security this city has ever seen, Ambassador Itzhak Aviran addressed a crowd of 800 who gathered at the site of the bombing.

The ambassador said the Argentine Supreme Court "kept the case paralyzed for six years" and "never interrogated the Iranian diplomats" who were thought to be involved in the blast, but "were allowed to leave Argentina unmolested."

Aviran then turned his ire on the police.

"The day of the bombing, the police assigned to our security were gone. A patrol car noticed [their absence] minutes before the explosion, but did not report it to command. This is extremely grave, but the Argentine police never investigated what really happened."

Aviran reiterated the accusation that Hezbollah operatives were behind the bombing and were also responsible for the July 18, 1994 bombing of the AMIA community centre in Buenos Aires, which killed 86 people.

As with the embassy attack, no suspects have been charged in connection with the AMIA blast and the crime remains unsolved.

Aviran concluded by asking "all Argentinians" to demand justice and by demanding that "the Argentine government, in this, its 50th year of friendship with Israel, do everything to capture those who destroyed a part of Israel and a part of Argentina."

In Israel, Foreign Minister Ariel Sharon called on the government of Argentina, "despite the difficulties and the time which has passed, to take every possible measure to find those guilty of this crime."

Sharon linked the embassy bombing to the "protracted struggle of over 100 years against Arab and Palestinian extremist terrorism," which "continues to strike at us in Israel, the Middle East and throughout the world."

Haredi soldier shows friend a piece of military equipment he has mastered. [Israel photo]

30 Haredim join IDF

By AVI MACHLIS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

TEL AVIV — At a lonely base in the northern Jordan Valley, a group of young devout men have replaced their black coats and Talmuds with army green and M-16 rifles.

Unlike the average Israeli trainee, they pray after the morning jog, have a daily Torah study session, eat in the army's only glatt kosher mess hall and serve on an all-male base. But since January, these young men – like all other Israeli draftees their age – are heeding the orders barked by their drill sergeants.

By choosing to serve instead of study the Torah full-time, they have broken a taboo in the haredi, community on an issue that has been at the heart of religious-secular tensions for decades. And when their five-month training course ends, the haredi infantrymen will be deployed on active duty.

"This group will become the flag-bearers for their entire community," says Yehuda Duvdevani, head of the Defence Ministry's Nahal and national missions division, who founded the program.

"They will show the community that those who are studying should study in yeshiva, but those who don't should join the army."

Since the haredi draftees prefer to remain anonymous, the Israel Defence Force does not allow journalists to visit the training camp. But in an interview with JTA, Duvdevani, 54, shared the story of how this historic group of soldiers was established.

He says the army is making a serious effort to understand the special needs of potential haredi soldiers and to create a framework that could bridge the widening religious-secular gulf.

The issue dates back to Israel's independence. Believing the haredi community would wither away, David Ben-Gurion, Israel's first prime minister, agreed to exempt 400 yeshiva students from military service.

In subsequent decades, yeshivas have grown and now boast more than 72,000 students. Angry secular Israelis say they have become a haven for draft-dodgers.

In 1996, Yitzhak Mordechai, then-defence minister, appointed Duvdevani, a former senior officer, to head the Nahal division and refocus it to confront challenges facing Israeli society.

For Duvdevani, a secular Jew, this mission was personal as well. In the battle of Latrun in the 1948 War of Independence, Duvdevani's father commanded hundreds of religious and secular new immigrants who arrived in the newly established Jewish state just days before being sent to the front.

Scores were killed in the battle, including Duvdevani's father, who was missing in action until last year.

"My father laid out the path for me," says Duvdevani. "In the army, we are one nation, with one destiny and one mission."

After meeting haredi rabbis, Knesset members and yeshiva students, Duvdevani realized that hundreds of young fervently Orthodox men were not studying in yeshivas, but were hanging out on the streets. "I told the haredi leaders that at least, they should let those boys who don't study enlist in the army," said Duvdevani.

After months of recruiting, a group of 30 young men recently agreed to enlist. The army chose a base, kashered the kitchen and barred women soldiers. Most of the staff who volunteered to train the Haredim were modern Orthodox Jews who understood the group's special needs.

Still, a few problems arose. One soldier complained that it was difficult to concentrate on morning prayers after the morning run. Since some soldiers' parents don't even know they have volunteered, some of the recruits take off their uniforms before returning home for weekend leave.

Yet according to Duvdevani, the fervently Orthodox soldiers salute the Israeli flag – a symbol of the secular Jewish state scorned by their community – during morning and evening roll calls.

Despite this symbol of allegiance, the rabbis' worst fears have not materialized. "The rabbis were afraid" the recruits would "lose their religion if they join the army," says Duvdevani.

"The irony is that some of them had stopped putting on tefillin before they were drafted, and now they are coming back to religion."

The army is also helping the recruits improve their math and English skills. "We want to give them something to go out to the world with," says Duvdevani.

It is still too early to say whether the program will have a lasting impact on the haredi community, but Duvdevani is confident that it will slowly usher in an acceptance of the army as a legitimate alternative for young haredi men.

"Not all of the rabbis agree with this initiative. But I'm sure that if this works, those that don't agree will start to realize that this is good for their community," says Duvdevani. "I want to build a bridge between the religious and secular worlds. What is at stake is the unity of Israel."

Is Arafat losing control of the streets?

By GIL SEDAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

Is Yasser Arafat losing his grip on power? The sight of Palestinians protesting against Palestinians two weeks ago in the streets of Gaza – where police shot and killed two protesters and the air hung thick with the smoke of burning tires – prompted some to wonder whether Arafat had a full-blown intifada on his hands.

Analysis

But while most observers believe that Arafat's grip remains intact for now, the protests provided a dramatic reminder of the deep frustrations that periodically boil to the surface of Palestinian society.

"This is not yet an intifada against Arafat," Res. Col. Shalom Harari, a former Arab affairs adviser at Israel's Defense Ministry, said, using the term for uprising.

"But it means that if Arafat goes, the street may be ripe for a military coup against the present ruling establishment."

Along with the frustrations among his people over the lack of progress in the peace process, Arafat has to contend with the frequently violent internecine strife involving local clans.

But perhaps most dangerous of all is the deep resentment felt by the Palestinian masses regarding what they perceive as a corrupt judicial system.

It was this sense – that an arrogant ruling elite is regularly dispensing injustice in the Palestinian courts – which brought the crowds into the streets last week for two consecutive days of violent demonstrations.

The protests erupted after a Palestinian court handed down a death sentence in a politically charged murder case.

The March 10 sentence had been imposed on Raed Attar for the slaying last month of policeman Rifat Joudeh.

To protest the verdict, members of Attar's family marched in the southern Gaza town of Rafah, where they protested outside the local headquarters of the Palestinian police.

The police opened fire to disperse the crowd – and when the smoke cleared, two Arab teenagers lay dead on the streets.

Arafat, who has the final say on death sentences, subsequently bowed to public pressure and agreed to review Attar's case. He also ordered the release of all those involved in the protests.

Raed al-Attar, 25, screams out in a Palestinian court as he is restrained by Palestinian security officials after being sentenced to die on March 10 for the killing of a Palestinian policeman in February. [RNS/Reuters]

Some observers said Arafat had no choice in the matter.

"I would regard this as an act of submission," Palestinian human rights activist Bassem Id said in an interview. "Arafat is giving in to the street.

"He simply runs the business without a proper legal system," he said, echoing a familiar Palestinian complaint that the legal system is totally dependent on Arafat's executive powers.

"We don't need a revolution," he added. "The laws are all there, they only need to be executed properly and consistently."

To accomplish this, Id called for the appointment of a respected independent judge to head the Palestinian judicial system.

Palestinians have long been complaining about the swift, summary sentences dispensed by the Palestinian courts.

Last year, two Palestinian security officials who killed two agents of another agency – and who belonged to a different clan – were executed, with Arafat's approval, after a trial that lasted only a few hours.

And last month, a Palestinian colonel who had been convicted of rape was executed by a firing squad on the night the sentence was issued.

Palestinians have long complained that security officials act as if they are above the law, that they treat the local population as they please. Police officers enter homes without court orders and carry out searches without any legal authority, critics charge.

In addition, critics complain, the judicial system is subservient to political expediency.

According to Id, some 400 political prisoners have been languishing in Palestinian jails for more than two years without trial.

Critics further charge that the absence of the rule of law goes far beyond political differences, noting that even tax offenders are frequently jailed without trial.

Compounding the situation are the large number of security agencies operating without any clear-cut distinctions regarding mission or responsibility.

There are at least eight different security agencies working for the Palestinian Authority, with members often belonging to rival clans.

What emerged from Attar's trial is that the two co-defendants, who were convicted but not sentenced to death, were members of one of the security agencies. But there were also claims that they were members of Hamas. In any event, all three were on Israel's wanted list.

Some observers believe that Arafat is devoting too much time to the peace process – particularly whether to declare Palestinian statehood in May – at the expense of pressing domestic social issues.

"Arafat spends most of his time trying to revive the peace process, or thinking about May 4," said Id, who charged that the Palestinian leader "lacks the proper infrastructure to create a state."

The Palestine Liberation Organization's governing bodies are expected to meet next month in the self-rule areas to decide whether Arafat should unilaterally declare Palestinian statehood in May.

The 125-member central committee and the 18-member executive committee are expected to review the recommendations from American and European leaders that Arafat postpone the declaration past May 4, the end of the interim period in Israeli-Palestinian negotiations under the terms of the Oslo accords.

Meanwhile, Arafat finds himself not only contending with the resentments of the Palestinian public, but also engaging in an ongoing sparring match with human-rights groups and Palestinian legislators.

Earlier this month, a human rights group based in the West Bank town of Ramallah said complaints by Palestinian citizens against the Palestinian Authority nearly doubled last year.

The Palestinian Independent Commission for Citizens Rights dealt with 825 complaints last year, an increase of 97 percent from 1997, according to its annual report.

Haidar Abdel Shafi, the group's commissioner, blamed the increase on the absence of checks on the Palestinian Authority's power.

A similar criticism has repeatedly been sounded by the Palestinian legislative council, which has often complained about its lack of real power.

Since its establishment three years ago, the Palestinian legislature has enacted 59 laws, but only nine have received Arafat's necessary signature.

Relations between Arafat and the legislature further eroded when Palestinian lawmakers revealed two years ago the presence of widespread corruption among some of Arafat's ministers.

Arafat, who had not been personally linked to the allegations, promised at the time to clean up shop, but little was done and some of the same corrupt ministers remain in power.

Critics of the Palestinian leader say Arafat should act soon to deal with the many criticisms confronting his government, warning that the continued frustrations coming from so many sectors of Palestinian society constitute a ticking time bomb.

The critics warn, that with Hamas and other rejectionist groups waiting in the wings, a failure to confront the sources of social tension could one day explode in Arafat's face.

Actress wedded to her part

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
CJN Staff

TORONTO — Sarah Meltzer is getting married today...and tomorrow. On the weekend she'll be tying the knot three more times and then she'll be at alter again next week and the week after that.

The Toronto-born actress is starring in Tony n' Tina's Wedding, an interactive comedy about an Italian wedding that goes disastrously wrong. It opened on Feb. 10 for an indefinite run at Vinnie Black's Chapel of Love at 56 Blue Jay Way.

Meltzer said that she told her mother that she was getting married "over and over and over again," when she got the part of Tina. "She was thrilled...It was really funny.

"I'm 26. I'm not married. And of course my mother would like for me to get married. So when I got the part she said she hoped that wasn't the only time she was going to see me as a bride."

Ironically, she landed the lead, her first role in professional theatre, a week after she made a full commitment to acting; she had decided against going to graduate school for psychology, she said.

Acting was always her first love, but she had studied psychology "to have something to fall back on," she explained. "I decided to concentrate on a full-time acting career.

"I didn't want anything else to fall back on...I committed myself to what I truly wanted to do. I think that's why I got the part."

Meltzer said that there are many parallels between herself and Tina: they are both strong willed, they each have one brother, both women had lost their fathers, and although Tina is Italian, Meltzer feels that there is an affinity between Jewish and Italian families.

Meltzer described the play as interactive dinner theatre; the audience members are the guests at the wedding. They attend the ceremony, pass through the reception line to congratulate the wedding party and they attend the reception where they dance and dine at a buffet dinner.

All the while, they have the opportunity to interact with the actors and become part of the show.

"The more the audience participates, the more fun everyone else has because you're working off them," Meltzer said.

"They allow themselves to enter the world of your wedding. You pull them or some volunteer to come up on stage. Some people really get into it.

"You have to do what happens in the night with the audience and that makes it different every night."

And that entails a lot of improvisational work, experience Meltzer accumulated during her university years.

Sarah Meltzer will have plenty of experience when she gets married.

At the University of Western Ontario, she organized her own improv troupe in second year and when she later transferred to York University where more theatre courses were available, she continued to hone her improvisational skills.

Meltzer, who grew up in North York, said she had wanted to act since the age of six. She got her start during elementary school through dramatic productions at the Beth Emeth Synagogue.

In high school, she studied drama and was involved in school productions. At 17 she had a small speaking part on ENG, a drama on CTV. She was also auditioning for commercials and had two national spots when she was 20.

When the opportunity to try out for Tina'n Tony's Wedding came up, Meltzer said she was determined to get the part of Tina.

After auditioning, she called the director and creator – U.S. comedien Jay Leggett, who starred in In living Color – but she ended up speaking with producer Andrew Alexander, head honcho of Second City.

"I said I really think I can do this part. If I didn't show my potential of doing this part, then call me in again to audition. I didn't realize I'd be saying it in person [instead of an answering machine].

"I wanted to set myself apart from the others. I wanted to stand out. Next day I got a call back. I re-auditioned. I was nervous, but I was committed.

She said her agent called her with the good news the following day. "He said, "How would you like to play Tina in Second City?' I yelled and my mother came running in."

Neither of them "realized the magnitude of the part and how much publicity it would get," Meltzer said. "Now when I go down to the Eaton Centre there are posters of the play everywhere.

"It's really interesting seeing my picture appear all the time...I feel really proud of myself."

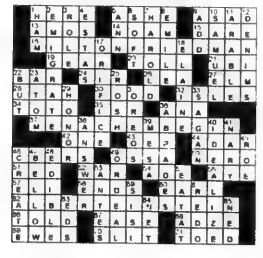
ANSWERS TO THIS WEEK'S CROSSWORD PUZZLE.



Hungarian Holocaust documented

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The Nazis left Hungary's Jews for last. On March 19, 1944, the German army marched into Hungary, and on May 15, the first transport of Hungarian Jews rolled into Auschwitz. Within about six weeks, more than 400,000 Hungarian Jews were murdered.

The Last Days, the first feature documentary from Steven Spielberg's Shoah Visual History Foundation, chronicles this tragedy primarily through the eyes of five survivors of the Holocaust in Hungary. It opens on March 26 at the Cineplex Odeon chain Directed by James Moll, The Last Days is an impressive cinematic achievement. The testimonies are stark, the narrative flows and the file footage, some never seen before, is indelibly haunting.

The witnesses are Tom Lantos, the first Holocaust survivor to be elected to the United States Congress; Alice Lok Cahana, who for decades searched for information about her sister's fate; Renee Firestone, whose inspiring spirit lights up the screen; Bill Basch, who had no alternative but to sacrifice a friend to save himself; and Irene Zisblatt, who repeatedly risked her life to preserve a family keepsake.

Lantos, born in Budapest, managed to evade his tormentors because of his "Aryan" coloring. The ordeal took a heavy toll on him. "I was 16, but I was very old," he observes.

Lok Cahana, from Budapest as well, was separated from her older sister, Edith, when they arrived in Auschwitz. The story of Lok Cahana's search for her sister rivets a viewer.

Firestone, from the town of Uzhorod, which is now in Ukraine, lost her childhood in Auschwitz.

Basch, who was raised in a village in the Carpathian Mountains, was herded into a cattle car bound for Buchenwald.

Zisblatt, whose Czech town of Poleno was annexed by Hungary, was the subject of a medical experiment in Auschwitz.

Remarkably enough, one of the German doctors who performed these ghastly experiments, Hans Munch, appears on screen. He comes across as distant and evasive.

Another person whose heartbreaking story we hear is that of a Greek Jew who witnessed the Final Solution in Auschwitz "from A to Z." This man, a worker in the crematoriums, warned a friend how to best prepare himself for death in the gas chamber. After the victim was gassed, he washed the body, then placed it in an oven to be burned. In the kingdom of death, this might have been considered a kindness!

Renee Firestone

As The Last Days unfolds, Randolph Braham, a historian who specializes in the Hungarian Holocaust, provides telling details about its implementation.

Concert features Burl's work

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The music of the late Gershon Burl, a pioneer violinist with the Toronto Symphony Orchestra, (TSO) came alive recently at Holy Blossom Temple.

His Russian-themed Solove (Nightingale Fantasy), completed by his son Bill Berle, highlighted a Chai Tea sponsored by the Friends of Yiddish, attended by 120 in the Phillip Smith Hall.

Berle, 74, who led a 16-piece orchestra in playing the three-part number, told The CJN that his lifelong ambition was to complete the work based on Russian folk songs that his father heard in Odessa.

Gershon Burl, who taught music to a large number of Jewish young people in Toronto, joined the TSO in 1925 as one of its first Jewish musicians.

The soloist was violinist Lance Ouellette, 20, a New Brunswick native, born of a Filipino mother and a French-Canadian father. In the final part of Solove, Ouellette's instrument mimicked the song and actions of a nightingale.

Among the musicians, all of whom volunteered their time for five weeks of rehearsal for the concert, were veteran violinists Samuel Barsh, Julius Goodman and Dave Colpitts, all Berle contemporaries.

Another guest artist was Berle's son, pianist Paul Mathew, who played a medley of numbers by well-known composers.

The concert included original compositions from Berle's album Winds of the Negev.

The same orchestra will play Solove at Pride of Israel Synagogue on April 4 at 2 p.m.

In the past few years, Berle has led a four-piece klezmer band which plays music during the cocktail hour and dinner at bnei/bnot mitzvah and weddings, which, he says, "adults can enjoy." He leaves the rest of the evening to the disc jockeys.

Berle, who also has three daughters and 19 grandchildren, still plays violin with the 80-piece York Symphony Orchestra which is playing an evening of music dedicated to Jewish composers May 31 at Leah Posluns Theatre.

YOU SAW THE MOVIE, NOW BUY THE HAGADDAH

Dreamworks, the Hollywood studio that recently produced The Prince of Egypt, an animated musical about the Exodus, has published an 88-page full-color Haggadah with more than 100 vivid illustrations from the cinematic epic.

A highlight of the book is a centre spread of the parting of the sea "that makes you feel as if you are in the middle of the movie," said 73-year-old artist Michel Schwartz, who adds that the book offers many intriguing questions designed to pique the curiosity and interest of modern readers.

According to Robin Bergart of Israel's Books & Gift on Eglinton Avenue, the Dreamworks Haggadah is one of several new commercial publishing ventures into the Passover market. There is also a Haggadah featuring characters from the movie Rugrats, and a Passover comic book involving characters from The Adventures of Mendy, a Canadian-drawn comic strip featured in the Kids pages of The CJN.

Rescuers' stories told

By LARRY ANKLEWICZ
Special to The CJN

A few years ago Barbra Streisand decided to undertake a series of one hour dramas based on the powerful book, Rescuers: Portraits of Moral Courage in the Holocaust.

With her partner, Cis Corman, Streisand produced this series of films specifically for broadcast on the Showtime cable network in the United States.

Six of these films are now available on video and they all deal with Righteous Gentiles. Each cassette contains two films.

The first video, titled Rescuers: Stories of Courage — Two Women, opens the series with powerful stories about two courageous women.

Both films were directed by noted filmmaker Peter Bogdanovich. His mother, a Jew, was saved by her Greek Orthodox husband who arranged visas to bring her to America in 1939. As a result, Bogdanovich felt a personal responsibility in seeing these stories brought to the screen.

The first film, Mamusha, focuses on Gertruda Babilinska (played by Elizabeth Perkins), a Polish nanny employed by the Stolowitsky family.

When the war breaks out, Mr. Stolowitsky disappears and the mother decides to take her young son to another city for greater safety. Gertruda insists on accompanying the family, and when the mother dies, Gertruda follows the mother's wishes, and raises the boy as a Jew.

Woman on a Bicycle, the second film on this cassette, tells the story of Marie-Rose Gineste (Sela Ward), a single woman employed by her church in a small town in France. She helps counterfeit identity papers for Jewish refugees and even hides some of them in her own home.

The second casette in the series, Rescuers: Stories of Courage – Two Couples, begins with Aart ad Hoht Je Vos, a newly-wed couple (played by Dana Delany and Martin Donovan) who turn their house in the Dutch countryside into a hideaway for fleeing Jewish refugees.

Marie Taquet (Linda Hamilton) and her husband (Alfred Molina) run a Catholic school for children of Belgian prisoners of war and use this school to hide young Jewish boys.

The final cassette in this series is called Rescuers: Stories of Courage – Two Families. Malka Csizmadia (Robin Tunney) is a teenager who enlists her mother and two sisters in a mission to help a group of Jewish refugees escape the prison camp behind their home.

In We Are Circus, a husband and wife team of circus owners in Germany (played by Tim Matheson and Daryl Hannah) use their operation to hide a family of Jewish circus performers.

All of these stories are touching tales about compassionate people who risked their own lives and the lives of their families to save Jewish lives.

Many of these films were produced in the Toronto area and a number of well-known-Canadian actors can be spotted in supporting roles, including Al Waxman and Theresa Tova.

These three videos were released by Paramount Home Video and should be available in video stores throughout the country. If your video retailer does not have any copies, ask him to order them from his distributor.

E-Commerce mission to Israel opens eyes

By JAMES PASTERNAK
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Although no deals were signed, the recent Canadian E-Commerce trade mission to Israel met the expectations of participants.

Canadian companies looking to develop and enhance new technologies in Internet business applications, recently returned from an intensive trade mission to Israel.

E-Commerce involved seven Canadian companies who confirmed the view that to profit in cyber commerce, doing business in Israel is essential.

The seven participants were Cebra Inc., Insurance Information Centre, EC-Gate, The Xenox Group Inc., Canada Post Systems Management, Ericsson and Unican.

"The trade mission was so successful that we are looking to do five or six more of them in the next year and a half," said Renah Persofsky, president of Cebra Inc.

The five-day mission provided little time for sightseeing and relaxing around the hotel pool. Israeli organizers had set up a rigorous regime of meetings between Canadian and Israeli firms. Canadians also attended related seminars organized by the Israel Export Institute (a mission organizer and sponsor) and visited the trade fair, Internet World '99.

Israeli trade officials arranged industry specific meetings between the Canadian participants and Israeli firms. The discussions involved companies interested in the latest advances in Internet and Intranet applications.

Included were speaker authentication applications, video-conference technology, e-mail security systems, illustration software for the life insurance industry and new advances in virtual sales applications. There were also discussions about resolving the psychological block of many consumers in conducting electronic commerce.

While no deals have been announced, signs indicate that the mission will produce results.

"I think it's premature to have deals signed," said Persofsky. "But I believe there will be deals signed. Xenox was working on some specific deals. We found some technology that we're negotiating with a company right now."

Persofsky was particularly impressed with many of the advances made by Israeli companies.

"We had a belief that the technology in Israel was good. What we found out was that it was better than we thought, especially in security systems on the Internet. We were extremely impressed. It was comparable to the best in the world," said Persofsky.

Yael Varsano-Barzilay.

The size of the delegation is reflective of the new approach Israeli officials are taking in enhancing commerce between Israel and Canada.

Yael Varsano-Barzilay, Israel trade commissioner to Canada, said large trade delegations with businesses in several industries are impressive; however, a more focused approach could in fact produce better results and provide more opportunities for trade mission sponsorship and funding.

"We feel that it is best to concentrate on a sector-oriented approach. This has been encouraged, and sectoral approaches receive better funding. While more general approaches are good public relations, if you really want to do business it should be on a sectoral approach. People don't have time for generalities," said Varsano-Barzilay.

Israel is known in the industry for its expertise. The country "is on the verge of becoming one of the leading lights in the high tech age." Malcolm S.Forbes, Jr., editor-in-chief of Forbes magazine, has written.

Israeli companies, either in joint ventures or on their own, have developed leading edge technologies in interactive multimedia display on the Internet, modem technology and Internet programming languages, among others.

Two American soldiers who liberated Dachau, where some Hungarian Jews ended up, also recall their experiences. The first was shaken profoundly by the sight of 40 box cars stuffed with corpses. The second shot a German soldier after he spat in his face.

Their stories are powerful and viewers will not likely forget them. But The Last Days really belongs to Lantos, Lok Cahana, Firestone, Basch and Zisblatt, whose affecting and succinct observations endow it with depth, passion and continuity.

Judging by their reminiscences, the vast majority of Hungarian Jews were intensely patriotic and never imagined that such atrocities would occur in Hungary. Yet when the crunch came, supposed neighbors turned hostile and Jews were "hunted like animals."

Cattle cars, bursting at the seams with Jewish deportees, reeking of feces and resounding with the screams of terrified children, rattled into Auschwitz, disgorging the hapless victims. Often, one of the witnesses recalls, Jews were sent straight from the trains to the gas chambers, with no official records of their deaths being compiled.

Certain vignettes are unforgettable: a frightened girl catches a last glimpse of her father as tears roll down his cheeks; a brutal guard slams a child against a truck, instantly killing him or her.

Yet The Last Days is not uniformly grim. Lantos and the others, having triumphantly rebuilt their lives in America, return to the scenes of the crime to gain a sense of closure. But one wonders whether closure is possible when the blood has barely dried.

Current Parchment dedicated to Israel's 50th

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

With all the visibility of the prophet Eliyahu, the literary journal Parchment slips quietly each year into the homes and minds of hundreds of readers across Canada, as well as to a smaller number in the United States and Israel.

At 165 pages, the seventh annual (1998-99) issue of the only journal devoted to Canadian Jewish writing is roughly one-third larger than in previous years. Featuring the colors of the Israeli flag on its cover, the current Parchment is dedicated to the state of Israel on its 50th anniversary.

In keeping with previous issues, a significant portion of the content focuses on the Jewish state, past and present, sometimes from a uniquely Canadian perspective. Other central themes of the nine stories and roughly 30 poems in the current issue include Jewish religious life and society, and the Holocaust.

Despite the presence in the current issue of several well-known contributors, such as Canadians Chava Rosenfarb and Jack Kuper, and Polish Nobel Prize winner Wislawa Szymborska, Parchment still maintains a muted, steadfast existence in the world of Canadian Jewish letters.

The publication has somewhere between 350 and 400 subscribers, which is considered respectable for a literary journal but seems paltry when compared to Canada's Jewish population of some 300,000.

Editor Adam Fuerstenberg says he has hopes of increasing the circulation into the 700 to 1,000 range.

"Unless you're a famous Jewish writer like Mordecai Richler or Matt Cohen, it's hard to get writing on Jewish themes published in this country," Fuerstenberg said. "Right now, Parchment is the only game in town. It's the only journal of contemporary Canadian Jewish writing; so the community should nurture it."

Previous issues of Parchment have contained many diamonds in the rough.

The 1997-98 issue, for example, included a segment by Toronto author Morley Torgov from his novel-in-progress, The War to End All Wars, recently published by Malcolm Lester Books. The same issue also featured the story by Ottawa scribe Gabriella Goliger that shared the $10,000 Journey Prize. And it presented a story by Toronto writer Lilian Nattel, whose first novel, The River Midnight, is now winning international critical acclaim.

The latest Parchment also carries contributions from J.J. Steinfeld, Robin McGrath, Emil Sher, Kenneth Sherman, Ruth Panofsky and Jay Brodbar, and numerous others.

The pieces range from ordinary to surprisingly excellent. The journal also features two other important lists of names – its impressive advisory board, and the equally impressive list of benefactors, patrons, sponsors and donors who help keep Parchment alive.

"We depend primarily on subscribers and on the generosity of donors," Fuerstenberg said. "I'm hoping that anyone who cares about and wants to support Jewish writing in Canada should become a subscriber."

Subscription rates are $12 for one year, $20 for two years. Subscriptions, as well as manuscript submissions, should be sent to Parchment, Centre for Jewish Studies, Vanier 260, York University, 4700 Keele St., North York, Ont. M3J 1P3.

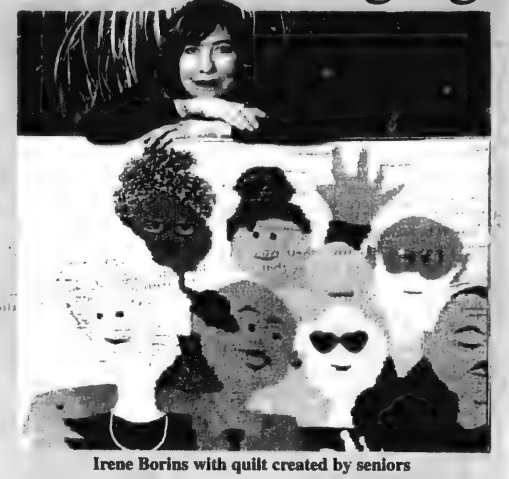
Geriatric social worker explores richness of aging

By IRENE BORINS
Special to The CJN



Irene Borins with quilt created by seniors

In honor of the 1999 global celebration of the United Nations International Year of Older Persons, as well as the 25th anniversary of St. Clair West Services for Seniors, where I work, I began to reflect on my professional life.

I am a geriatric social worker, and since graduating from Yeshiva University 12 years ago, I have spent most of my time working with the elderly.

In return for any help I may have given the seniors, they have taught me an overwhelming amount and have certainly enriched my professional and personal life.

So much literature focuses on the losses that seniors experience – the physical, as well as the psychological. But I prefer to look at the richness and beauty of aging. The potential of an older adult is unlimited, if a healthy attitude is nurtured.

I have asked myself over and over why some seniors have incredibly positive attitudes, even if they have had difficult lives, while others wallow in self pity about every loss, ache and pain they experience.

There are seniors who are filled with joy and love. They have a sense of purpose. Their lives are rich, and they are fulfilled. But others waste precious years, withdrawing inward, instead of reaching out to the world around them.

People who have confronted their own losses in the life cycle are able to see beyond their own needs. They are capable of being sensitive to the needs of others – family members, friends, acquaintances their community.

Some aging people remain stuck in the narrow ethics of self-centred individualism, but the challenge of aging can become an opportunity for personal and spiritual growth.

I will cite one example, a woman who was able to grow spiritually, in spite of having lost her family in the Holocaust. She was able to cope with the death of her husband and her daughter-in-law, who died a short while before he did.

This woman was a joy to be with. I asked her how she could have such a healthy attitude, after suffering such loss and pain in her life.

She said she had found personal meaning for herself. She focused on helping other people without looking for praise or recognition for her deeds. Out of this she received a tremendous amount of joy, inner peace and self-satisfaction. She always shared what she had and what she knew with others. She said she was never jealous and she had no regrets in her life. She was in touch with her inner spirit and was able to find inner peace, despite the pain she had suffered in her life.

As people age, it is important for them to become aware of how they will be remembered. What will family and friends say about who a person was in his or her lifetime? Will their legacy be one of love, or one of self-centred individualism?

What can we do to create a meaningful journey in the time we have left to us? Time is precious. It is a gift when it used well. People often have more time in their senior years than during their youth.

Imagine having time to share with family or friends. Imagine being able to nurture relationships with grandchildren. Many seniors have resolved their anger over the years and developed insight and awareness. It is important to take time to share this wisdom with others.

Imagine having the time to develop a hobby. I had the opportunity last winter to visit South Africa with my 75-year-old mother. I met a woman who is 74, and she is now teaching me photography. She improves her photography skills as she ages, and she is eager to share her knowledge and skills with others.

Having the time to take courses is another gift. Teaching younger people skills can also be a gift to the student, one that will enrich the life of the senior as well.

Reminiscing can be important too — sharing thoughts and memories with children and grandchildren. Often these memories will endure beyond the life of the senior.

Volunteering is a way seniors can share their wisdom with others. I once met a man at a volunteer recognition reception, whose face was covered with bandages. His nose had been eaten away by cancer, but this did not stop him from helping others. While outwardly he was visibly deformed, his inner core – his heart and soul – were intact. He still had strength and compassion for others.

I believe every older person needs a project. It can be a longstanding interest or something completely new. It should be one that is challenging, but not so big as to be disheartening. Create a purpose for yourself, and share it with others.

I admire men and women who accept age as a series of challenges. Each problem can be seen as an obstacle to overcome. Each obstacle can be seen as a victory worth rejoicing over.

So let's all — old and young – celebrate the International Year of Older Persons.

BIRTHING CENTRE

Israel's Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu recently praised the work of Shaare Zedek Medical Centre's Woman and Infant Centre, which opened last year. The new facility expects to cater to up to 750 births each month. Among the many woman at the centre was Levana, 40, who gave birth to her first baby after 22 years of trying. She is seen here with her daughter.

BENJAMIN'S PARK MEMORIAL CHAPEL

Israel & the Jewish World

Missionary activity Down Under

By JEREMY JONES
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

SYDNEY — Leaders of Sydney's Jewish community, responding to a dramatic increase in missionary activity aimed at converting Jews to Christianity, have called on the hierarchy of the Anglican Church to stop a practice they say Jews regard with abhorrence.

Until the 1970s, Anglicanism, previously known as the Church of England, was Australia's largest religion, and one in four Australians still belong to the church. Jewish-Anglican dialogue began for the first time in 1997.

At the second dialogue, held here recently, Jewish Board of Deputies president Peter Wertheim told the five-person Anglican delegation that there is an "urgent need for the Anglican Church to promulgate guidelines on acceptable and unacceptable missionizing methods."

Of particular concern to Jews in Sydney are the activities of Jews for Jesus and Kehillat ha-Moshiach, which are led by ministers with Jewish backgrounds.

The literature of the groups, which is often phrased to appeal to schoolchildren, includes insulting caricatures of Judaism as a religion that requires "fulfilment" through Christianity.

Rabbi Raymond Apple, spiritual leader at the Great Synagogue in Sydney, said the Anglican paper on missionizing delivered at the dialogue was "diplomatic," but that it was "unambiguous in its presentation of the Anglican view" that a core Christian belief is that Jews should be converted to Christianity.

Although not discussed at the meeting, the Jewish community has also recently lodged complaints with the Anglican Church that textbooks in church schools teach that Jews killed Jesus, and the pupils are taught that Jews who do not accept Jesus as the messiah will go to hell.

Canadian junior champion

Soo skier wins gold at national competition

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Like a finely-tuned athletic machine, cross-country skier Adam Kates has to click on all eight cylinders if he wants to win a race.

Over the course of a 30- or even a 10-kilometre contest, every little technical imperfection is magnified into lost time and increased energy expenditure.

But two weekends ago in Smithers, B.C., all systems were operating smoothly as the 18-year-old cross-country skier from Sault Ste. Marie finished first overall at the Canadian Junior National Championships.

Kates finished third in the 10-km "classic," second in the 15-km "freestyle" (aka "skate") and fifth in the 30-km skate, to earn 83 out of a possible 90 points and take home the gold medal. A bronze medal in the 3 by 7.5 km relay race rounded out his weekend.

Going into the last day of competition in Smithers, Kates sat in second place. But a strong performance, coupled with an inexplicably bad day for the second-round leader, vaulted him into first.

In cross-country skiing, particularly in a 30-km race, efficient technique is vital, he said. "Every motion has to maximize effort."

In classic style, skiers slide their legs in a forward and back motion, while in the freestyle (skate) technique, they propel themselves forward much like an ice skater, pushing to the side with one leg and gliding forward on the other.

"If you waste too much energy, you create more resistance and it takes more energy to drive forward," Kates said.

Champion skiers, Kates has learned, have to combine excellent cardiovascular fitness with "the ability to stay focused. You have to concentrate on skiing efficiently. Technique is so important."

Kates' gold in Smithers, his best finish at the national level since 1996 when he won gold as a juvenile, didn't come easy. A member of the Soo Finnish Ski Club, Kates logs lots of hours to help move him to the top of the class among cross-country skiers in his age group.

During the summer, Kates works out on skis fitted with wheels, designed to emulate the feel of the winter, snowbound sport. Once the snow hits the tundra, he moves outdoors for twice-a-day workouts, six or seven days a week. Cold temperatures don't dissuade him from his appointed tasks, although once the thermometer hits minus 20, he eases up a little.

"It isn't good for the lungs to breath too much cold air," he explained.

Kates supplements his training regimen with summer sports like mountain biking, track and field, cross-country running and golf.

Highly motivated and goal-oriented, Kates credits his coach, Helen Lindfors, a former nationally ranked skier herself, with designing his training program and with helping him develop successful race strategies.

Adam Kates

Shortly after he began skiing competitively five years ago, his hard work began paying off. By the end of his first season of competitive skiing in 1995, he managed a first in freestyle and a fifth in classic at the Ontario Provincials in New Liskeard.

He continued to improve the next year, with several first and second place finishes in events in Timmins, the Soo and Thunder Bay. The season culminated with his juvenile win at the Canadian Junior Nationals in 100 Mile House, B.C.

In '97, he slipped a little bit, finishing out of the medals at the Junior championships in Cornerbrook, Nfld., but in 1998, at the Nationals in Val Cartier, Que., he finished 13th in the 10-km freestyle, first in the 15-km classic and second in the 7.5-km classic. In December 1998 at the Canadian World Junior Trials in Canmore, Alta., he finished eighth in the 10-km classic and 18th in the 20-km freestyle after his skis were taken by another athlete and he had to borrow another pair.

Kates qualified for the Canada Winter Games thanks to seventh (10-km classic) and third (15-km freestyle) place finishes. Competing again in Corner Brook at the Winter Games in February 1999, he finished fourth overall but won a relay gold.

An event in Idaho later this month will close out his season while providing him with international competition.

Looking ahead, Kates is eyeing a spot on the senior Canadian national team and a shot at the Olympics. Next year, he plans to attend Lakehead University in Thunder Bay, one of the headquarters for the national team and a school that will provide him with top notch coaching.

Kates recognizes that cross-country skiers don't hit their peak until they're around 27 or 28, so in the meantime he plans to study English and political science.

His future in skiing depends on where his employment career takes him, but with gold medals already under his belt, "the Olympics are a realistic goal," he said.

Terrorist Abu Nidal is in Cairo, says biographer of Syria's Assad

By DOUGLAS DAVIS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LONDON — Top international terrorist Abu Nidal is alive and well and living in Cairo, according to an article in the London-based daily Al-Hayat last week.

Abu Nidal

Noted Arabist Patrick Seale, a biographer of Syrian President Hafez Assad and reportedly close to the Syrian regime, said Abu Nidal – the nom de guerre of Jaffa-born Sabri al-Banna – left his safe haven in Libya after falling out with Libyan leader Muammar Gaddafi.

Seale flatly denied reports in both the Arabic and western media that Abu Nidal was dying of leukemia and had been moved to Iraq.

Such reports, said Seale, were probably a concoction of Egyptian intelligence "to conceal his presence in Cairo and give themselves time to decide what to do with him."

Abu Nidal is reportedly now seeking to trade his extensive knowledge of radical Islamic groups, and of the inner workings of the regimes in Sudan, Yemen and Libya, for Egyptian protection.

"In particular, he is trying to sell his services to Egyptian state security in its war against militant Islamic networks such as Gihad and Gama'a al-Islamiya, which have been responsible for numerous attacks in Egypt against tourists and other targets," wrote Seale. "There is no suggestion that Egypt has taken up Abu Nidal's offer."

Although some Egyptian – and perhaps American – intelligence officers might be tempted to use Abu Nidal, Seale noted, western diplomats believe that the revelation of his presence in Cairo could prove a grave embarrassment to Egypt and damage its international standing.

"But Abu Nidal is clearly hoping to relaunch his dormant terrorist career under the protection of a new state patron."

In another startling revelation, Seale claimed that Israel had comprehensively penetrated Abu Nidal's Fatah Revolutionary Council.

He said top Abu Nidal defectors who renounced terrorism and recently settled in the West Bank and Gaza Strip with the permission of the Israeli authorities, include two former terrorists who were involved in high-profile atrocities against Israeli targets.

Among those named by Seale as having settled in the Palestinian-controlled areas are Ali al-Farra and Hisham Harb.

Al-Farra, according to Seale, is a former head of external intelligence for the Fatah Revolutionary Council and was involved in planning the attempted assassination of former ambassador to London, Shlomo Argov, on June 3, 1982, an event that provided a pretext for Israel's invasion of Lebanon.

Harb is described as having been a key member of Abu Nidal's Special Missions department and played a major role in the simultaneous attacks on El Al ticket counters at the Rome and Vienna airports in December 1985.

Abu Nidal was the PLO's chief representative in Iraq when he broke with Yasser Arafat's Fatah movement in 1974 to protest the PLO's flirtation with diplomacy rather than violence.

His Fatah Revolutionary Council claimed hundreds of lives and was regarded as one of the most dangerous and savage of international terrorist organizations.

But while he attacked Israeli and Jewish targets throughout the world, Abu Nidal is believed to have been responsible for even more killings of Palestinians.

He ordered the assassinations of the PLO's most dovish diplomats, including Sa'id Hammami in London, Ali Yassin in Kuwait and Izzeddin Khalak in Paris, all three in 1978. He was also responsible for the killings of Naim Khodr in Brussels in 1981 and Issam Sartawi in Lisbon in 1983.

One of his more recent Palestinian victims was Abu Iyad, the nom de guerre of Salah Khalaf, Arafat's intelligence chief and one of the closest confidants of the Palestinian leader, who was assassinated in January 1991, just before the start of the Persian Gulf War.

About Seniors

Dear Jesse,

Please help me. I am in trouble. The police are threatening to arrest me. I am 80 years old. My neighbors are very noisy. It has become so bad it is making me sick! Sometimes they bang on the walls. In order to drown out this noise I play music in my house. This has helped because I do not hear the noise anymore

My neighbors called the police. The police told me that they would arrest me if I did not lower the music. I am a Holocaust survivor and deserve better than this at my stage of life. When I lower the music I hear the noise. I receive a lot of services at home. The local agency helps me with bathing. My son does the shopping. Nobody wants to hear about the problems with my tenants. Please help me. I don't want to go with the police. I need a lawyer!

BJ

Dear BJ,

You are in a terribly frightening situation. Your solution to the problem with your neighbors has created other problems for you. Nobody wants to be involved with the police, especially at your age.

Many survivors have great concerns when involved with the police. It sounds like you do need help from a lawyer.

A social worker may be necessary as well, to support you at this terrible time and to help you to resolve your housing situation. Most agencies can refer you to a sympathetic lawyer. Some agencies have access to emergency assistance funds that may be used to help you through your legal troubles and perhaps help you to relocate into better quality housing.

Readers are invited to send any questions they have for Jesse to The CJN. Jesse is the executive director of Jewish Support Services for the Elderly (JSSE) in Montreal.

OTTAWA — The Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) wants an explanation from Prime Minister Jean Chrétien for statements it says seem at odds with long-standing Canadian policy on the Middle East peace process.

Following last week's one-day visit to Ottawa by Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat, the CIC wrote to the Prime Minister's Office asking for clarification of one of Chrétien's comments made following his 40-minute meeting with Arafat.

While the prime minister told reporters that Canada cannot support Palestinian independence unless it was negotiated, he also said the following: "We believe that, through negotiations, we should result with the creation of a state for the Palestinians."

The CIC concedes it may have been a slip of the tongue, but the lobby group wants an explanation because it says the statement stands in contrast to established

Like a loving old friend

Editorial

And so the calendar brings us again to the festival of freedom. Wafting in on the warm breezes of a dawning spring, Pesach arrives like a loving old friend who visits every year. And because her visit lasts eight days, the house must be prepared with hard work and punctilious regard for the unique accommodations that this very special occasion demands.

Although the primary burden of preparation falls on the mother/wife/matriarch of the house, everyone in the family usually tries to assist to some extent. For example, in the accompanying photo, we see Lauren Farkash, left, and Elyssa Frohlich, senior nursery students at Hebrew Foundation School in Dollard Des Ormeaux, Que., preparing matzah covers to be used during the holiday. The expressions on their faces tell us clearly that they are committed to making the most beautiful of all matzah covers for the decorative display on their respective seder tables.

In the details of this photo are the holiday's two key components: the matzah and the children.

The matzah, the bread of affliction, the bread of poverty, the bread fashioned in the tumult of a slave nation's hasty, early morning departure from the place of their enslavement, symbolizes the religious, theological, historic and ethical substance of the holiday. The children are the present and future custodians of that symbol. They are the inheritors and the transmitters of the religion, the theology, the history and the ethics that this humble and lowly bread has embodied for more than 3,000 years.

And so, as the calendar brings us again to the festival of freedom, and our focus necessarily settles on the mystery and miracle of our traditions and on the great gift of life renewed, our hearts ache with gratitude.

That is why our plea at the end of the seder is always and ever meaningful: "As we have lived to celebrate [the Passover seder]/ So may we live to celebrate it again." Blessed are you O Lord, our God, King of the universe for granting us life, sustaining us and for bringing us to this day once again.

Passover Greetings

Freedom celebrated

Passover Message from Israel Ambassador David Sultan

As we approach Pesach I would like to wish the entire Jewish community of Canada a happy and kosher Chag Samayach. It is not only the celebration of our freedom and redemption, but also of our unity as it was, and is, our collective experience. It is the time that we get together to mark what we share and what we have in common, which are stronger than any differences that we may have.

I would like to use this opportunity to update you on the relations between Israel and Canada. I believe we have reasons for satisfaction. The recent visits to Israel of ministers John Manley and Sergio Marchi highlighted the growth of the economic relations between the two countries, as the figures can attest to. In the framework of these visits, we signed a protocol on cooperation in telecommunications, and after a long period of preparations, last month we signed an agreement on cultural cooperation.

This month in Jerusalem, we had periodical political consultations in which we exchanged views on a host of subjects of interest to the two sides. We also explored the possibilities of adding new areas of cooperation between our countries. The feeling is that there is a lot that should be done and achieved.

In Israel, we are in an election period. True, we have a large number of parties running, reflecting the pluralistic nature of our society. But there is a growing acceptance to form a national unity government after the election, to better face the challenges that lie ahead.

Meanwhile, my best wishes for a Happy Passover to each and every one of you.

Passover unity

Passover message from Canadian Jewish Congress National President, Moshe Ronen

On the eve of Passover, and as Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) marks its 80th anniversary, it is perhaps fitting to look back on just how far we have come as a community in this country.

As you all sit down at the table for the Passover seders and retell the story of the Festival of Freedom, the Exodus of Jews from Egypt, consider as well how less than 60 years ago we had a federal government with a policy of "none is too many" with regard to accepting immigrant Jews fleeing the Holocaust.

Fast forward to 1999, where the prime minister of Canada, Jean Chrétien, visited the grounds of the former Auschwitz-Birkenau death camp in the company of me and my father, a survivor of this terrible place where 1.3 million Jews met their deaths. We look forward to a government announcement following on this historic pilgrimage regarding the establishment of a national Holocaust memorial museum in Ottawa.

Today, Canada is bringing Nazi war criminals to justice and vigorously combatting those who spread hatred against identifiable groups. In Ontario, the legislature has adopted a bill marking Yom Hashoah as a permanent fixture on the provincial calendar, beginning April 13 this year.

Over the years, CJC has made every effort to assist fellow Jews and others in need in Canada and around the world. We participated at home in emergency relief efforts for victims of the Quebec and Manitoba floods and the Quebec-Ontario ice storm, to provide recent examples.

Abroad, likewise, we have distributed humanitarian aid on a non-sectarian basis in such disparate places as Honduras, the Caribbean, the Balkans, Ukraine, Romania and Rwanda. This includes everything from supplying Cuba's Jewish community with Passover food to raising funds to help Central American victims of last fall's Hurricane Mitch.

At the seder, we must also recognize that Israel is one of the most spectacular achievements of the 20th century. The Jewish people, beginning more than 50 years ago while on the brink of destruction and against all odds, established an independent state in their historic homeland, revived an ancient language, and produced one of the most prosperous and technologically advanced economies in the world.

It also is projected that Israel, early in the new millennium, will be home to the majority of the world's Jews, thus fulfilling the dream of in-gathering the exiles. Just as we wonder about the generation of the exodus from Egypt, historians looking back on our times will wonder about, and will be in awe of, the generations that reconquered the land and came home in a modern-day redemption.

On this Passover, let us not dwell on what divides us but coalesce around that which unites us. The Jewish community desperately needs bridge-building of its own. We see it as an important role for Canadian Jewish Congress to foster such unity.

The scandal of homelessness

There's been a flurry of activity on homelessness over the past few weeks. Last week, Toronto Mayor Mel Lastman convened a national symposium on the problem, involving politicians from all levels of government. Earlier this month, Prime Minister Jean Chrétien appointed Labor Minister Claudette Bradshaw responsible for the homeless. And social action groups continue to speak out. In that vein, Ve'ahavta – the Canadian Jewish Humanitarian & Relief Committee launched its Mobile Jewish Response to the Homeless, which delivers direct aid to Toronto's homeless. CJN reporter Ron Csillag last week went along on one of the organization's evenings, and filed the following report.

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

"The homeless are not crazy," I kept repeating to myself. "Relax. No one will pull a knife. I won't catch a disease."

Odd, these hoary stereotypes which persist. Some experts believe we cling to prejudices as a self-protection mechanism. Whatever the case, I tried to dispel every myth I had about the homeless prior to my assignment: going out with the newly created Mobile Jewish Response to the Homeless, another project of Ve'ahavta, the protean group dedicated to tikkun olam – making the world a better place.

Special Report

Other Jewish groups do a lot for the homeless. Mazon raises money to buy food for shelters and food banks, while several synagogues take part in the Out of the Cold program, which takes in and feeds the homeless for one night. But Ve'ahavta is the first Canadian Jewish organization to go directly to the frontlines, delivering donated food, blankets and other essentials right to the streets.

Over 30 volunteers have signed up so far. Every Wednesday night, rotating teams of three or four go out in a van loaded with soup, sandwiches, hot chocolate, coats, sleeping bags and tobacco. So many have expressed interest that Monday nights were recently added to the 13-week pilot project, which is being underwritten by the Edward Bronfman Family Foundation.

Ve'ahavta has teamed with the Native Men's Residence on Vaughan Road in the long-established program known as Street Help. Every homeless person, it seems, recognizes the burgundy van emblazoned with the words, Street Help, in large white letters.

A training session held at the residence last month addressed volunteers' fears and concerns. We were assured that the homeless are rarely if ever dangerous, and that in fact, we would encounter polite, even dignified people. Our approach should be non-judgmental and friendly, but never patronizing.

My teammates this night were Avrum Rosensweig, Ve'avhata's inspired executive director; his girlfriend, Roz Gelade, who works for UJA Federation; and Rabbi Daniel Gottlieb, spiritual leader of Temple Kol Ami in Thornhill.

We meet at the Native Men's Residence at around seven o'clock, and begin loading the van with clothes and supplies procured by Ve'ahavta, and with soup and sandwiches prepared by the residence. Ken, our good-natured driver, says the brand new sleeping bags are sometimes used as currency on the streets, traded for drugs or booze. But most of them, he assures us, are kept.

The night is bone-chilling; a frigid, damp wind cuts through my ski jacket and two pairs of sweat pants. The van loaded, Ken leads us in a native ceremony called smudging, in which smoke from burning sage is cupped in the hands and passed over the body and head. Rabbi Gottlieb then recites a blessing, asking God to help us in our mission.

The first thing we do is search for a man who has lived in a vacant lot in the Bathurst-Lawrence area for some 10 years. We find his makeshift tent, but there's no sign of him, and Ken says there hasn't been

Tragedy Has Struck

An extraordinary woman in our community—a 50 year old, single mother of 10 children, has tragically passed away after a serious illness.

Her modest salary as a secretary for one of our local Jewish Day Schools, allowed her to barely cover the basic family expenses, let alone the cost of expensive medical treatment and nursing care.

The children have been left with about $200k in debts and no further means of financial support. Funds are required for basic necessities such as food, clothing, housing and Jewish education.

The family desperately wants to stay together, with the older children taking on the responsibility of raising and ultimately marrying off the younger ones and themselves.

We appeal to you to support our community's efforts to establish a trust fund for these children. All cheques over $10 will receive charitable tax receipts. In the spirit of Jewish compassion and generosity at this holiday time, please open your hearts and donate generously. Thank you.

Desultory Haggadic notes

The Passover seder ties into one remarkably strong, tightly woven, sustaining cord, many of the elementary "strands" necessary for the trans-generational transmission of customs and traditions.

In the first place, the occasion itself is happy, celebratory and festive. In most homes, the table is extended to accommodate a wider than normal circle of family and friends.

The centrepiece of the evening is the meal, usually resplendent with varied and generous offerings. Indeed, all of the "action," religious and gustatory, takes place around the dining room table.

Sandwiched on either side of the meal is the recitation and "re-enactment" of the Exodus from Egypt, in its own right, an entertaining, compelling, thrill-a-minute story.

Our great and sage rabbis deliberately designed the recitation and re-enactment of that story with the maximum participation of young children in mind. This means that the evening is usually fun for the youngsters. And if the children are having fun, so too are their parents and their grandparents.

Thus, the Passover seder, a happy, family-oriented experience for young and old, creates in us a reservoir of positive associations and poignant memories. These memories are the building blocks of the structure we call tradition.

For thousands of years, literally, each generation has fashioned, held onto, and then transmitted those memories to the next generation, adding its part to the super-structure of the Jewish tradition.

Because of the special enjoyment that the seder evokes, many of us nurture our own private seder customs. For example, one of my idiosyncratic seder customs is to try to acquire a new Haggadah each year.

The Haggadah is a unique text in the corpus of Jewish literature. Whereas originally, in Mishnaic times, it did not appear as its own textbook, it evolved over the ages into a discrete text, one of the most decorated, most illuminated and most commented upon of all Hebrew manuscripts.

In these current times, as bombs fall on Yugoslavia, it is interesting to note that one of the earliest and most important of the illuminated haggadot is the Sarajevo Haggadah.

The variety of haggadot available to the readers is endless, quite a rich vein for the curious reader to mine, and it is constantly increasing.

For the devotees of art and illustration, there are countless beautifully illuminated haggadot such as the Shalom of Safed Haggadah, or the popular Passover Haggadah Legends and Customs from Adama Publishing House, featuring the artistry of Haim Ron; or the recently released, colorful Seelig Art Haggadah. There is even now a Prince of Egypt Haggadah featuring the breathtaking cinematic art from the recent movie.

For the devotee of the more traditional Haggadah, there is of course, an inexhaustible supply. Each offers a mini-portrait of the intellectual idiosyncrasies and scholarly approaches of the respective commentator.

For example, the Haggadah of Rabbi Adin Steinsaltz provides a great deal of commentary that highlights his penchant for historic and etymological explanations. Thus, the Steinsaltz commentary includes the following observation: "Some people used to say Hay Lachma (rather than Hah Lachma) to hint, among other things, that the letter hay in the word matzah itself, is also suggestive of the letter hay in God's name." (Our translation)

Dry Bones

Rabbi Reuven Bulka, the spiritual leader of Machzikei Hadas Congregation in Ottawa is also a psychologist. Not surprisingly, therefore, his commentary on the Haggadah offers psychological insights. For example, in discussing the child who does not know, Bulka observes: "Though the general pedagogic pattern at the seder, as a paradigm of all education, is that the child be encouraged to ask, and for the parent to respond to the unique situation and capacity of each child, that pattern is hardly possible with the child who does not know enough to ask. The parent-teacher must know when to encourage questions and also when to teach...".

The Yeshiva University Haggadah, compiled and edited by Steven Cohen and Kenneth Brander, emphasizes the intellectual excellence and rigor of the Yeshiva University community.

In addition to a running commentary on the text of the seder, it also provides nine essays, each written by a different scholar, including the late Rav J.B. Soloveitchik.

The Schocken Passover Haggadah edited by Nahum Glatzer, provides less commentary; but it does contain a veritable mini-library of related Passover readings written by modern authors such as Martin Buber, Leonard Fein, Michael Walzer and Marge Piercy.

Thus, it is important that we choose an "appropriate" Haggadah; nurture positive associations; and grasp tight the cord of common history and of common traditions.

Report documents human rights progress in 1998

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Advances in employment equity, pay equity and employers' willingness to accommodate minority groups were key developments in the field of human rights in 1998, according to an annual report released recently by the Canadian Human Rights Commission (CHRC).

Hundreds of corporations have taken steps to implement guidelines on employment equity, though much work remains to be done to ensure that minorities are proportionally represented in various fields of work, the report stated.

The CHRC reported that by the end of December 1998, the Employment Equity Act covered 412 federally regulated private and Crown corporations and government departments.

The commission planned to audit all employers within five years to ensure they had implemented a 12-part program on employment equity. Changes in the Employment Equity Act of 1997 "require the CHRC to determine whether four designated groups – women, members of visible minorities, people with disabilities and Aboriginal people – are equitably represent in an employers' workforce."

Turning to pay equity, the report suggested that "stalling" of cases has "postponed justice for many female employees despite a July 1998 decision of the Canadian Human Rights Tribunal mandating pay equity for federal public servants."

That "landmark" decision established a formula "for correcting wage discrimination whose existence had been made clear," the report stated. "Tens of thousands of current or former public servants, most of them women in low-paying jobs, stood to benefit."

Despite the planned appeal by the Minister of Justice and the President of the Treasury Board, the CHRC believes the pay equity decision "offered a reasonable, balanced approach to redressing unfair wage gaps in the federal public service."

The year was also marked by important changes in federal hate propaganda provisions. "Victims specifically identified in hate messages may now receive compensation and those responsible for disseminating such propaganda face penalties of up to $10,000," the annual report stated.

In the area of race relations, the report indicated "racially motivated violence still takes place in our country, as the killing of a Sikh caretaker at a temple in British Columbia reminded us."

The report quoted data collected by the Simon Wiesenthal Centre that showed hate sites on the Internet increased from 50 to more than 800 in three years. One case arising in that area involves neo-Nazi propagandist Ernst Zundel, who is alleged to have posted material on an Internet site that could expose Jews to hatred or contempt. That case is ongoing.

In February 1998, the Commission asked a human rights tribunal to examine a case involving Mark Harding, who allegedly offered telephone hate messages that targeted Muslims. (In 1998, Harding was convicted under the Criminal Code of promoting hatred against Muslims.)

The CHRC reported that it completed work on 378 complaints of discrimination in 1998. Of that number, 28 were resolved, 77 were referred to alternative grievance mechanisms and five cases were referred to the Canadian Human Rights Tribunal for a hearing.

The annual report also examined changes that allowed gay men and women to "receive full rights under the law."

In the case of Vriend v. Alberta, the Supreme Court of Canada ruled that Alberta legislation violated the Charter of Rights and Freedoms because it did not include sexual orientation as a prohibited ground of discrimination.

And in the case of Rosenberg v. Canada, the Ontario Court of Appeal ruled that the definition of "spouse" in the Income Tax Act, as it applies to the registration of pension plans, was unconstitutional because it excluded same-sex survivor benefits.

Despite the ruling, which is not being appealed, "the government has yet to amend other statutes at issue," the report stated.

Meanwhile, Holocaust survivor and community volunteer Sigmund Reiser, a member of the CHRC since 1994, resigned from the Commission as of September 1998 to take a position as a citizenship judge.

There is a world of difference between "life goes on" and "life is good."

When people age, or become ill, or suffer a trauma, they don't suddenly give up who they are to take on a new identity called 'patient' or 'client'. They remain themselves, with deeply rooted values, traditions, and needs.

That's why at circle of care, we pay attention to what makes each person unique. Our home care options take into account lifestyle, family and community. We are sensitive to and respect each person's religion, culture, language, and background.

At circle of care, we recognize that circumstances can threaten a person's vitality, their capacity to function independently, and their ability to participate in family and community life. So we offer choices in home care to meet those needs. As a result, many of our programs create the means that can make life special again.

How Toronto's personalities celebrate Passover

Fond memories recalled

JOYCE SINGER
Special to the CJN

For many of us, Passover is a favorite holiday spent with family and friends, passing down traditions to the younger generation.

It's a poignant, annual reminder of our historical struggles for freedom, and our hopes for a lasting peace in our homeland.

Occasionally, we are reminded of our diversity, and that we each have unique ways of celebrating our traditions. The following people passed along their holiday plans, and their fond memories of Pesach past.

Blayne Lastman

Noooooobody is better known around town than the Lastman family, and Blayne Lastman, president of the Bad Boy Furniture stores says that it's a favorite holiday around his house.

"It's a nice time of the year. One of the seders will be at my house, and, yes, my parents will be there." (It's not everyone who can say that the mayor will be at their seder!)

"My mother's father was a cantor, so the seders when I was growing up were, in one word – long!

"My kids, (Samantha, 9, Bradley, 6), know a whole lot more Hebrew than I do. Samantha knows so much, compared to my knowledge of the language. I'll leave the part about the afikoman to my father, as he gets pleasure out of paying." He jokingly read, before the actual Exodus from Egypt, Passover was a spring festival. I like the original Passover, and that's what I celebrate – rebirth and renewal," Marilyn says.

Lauri Sue Robertson

reassured me that it won't come out of our taxes.

Lauri Sue Robertson is the vice-president of Handidactis Inc., a non-profit organization that teaches people how to work with the disabled. Lauri says that she and her husband are looking forward to seeing her parents at her seder.

"We're excited, because two days after Passover, my dad turns 80. We also invited a couple of friends who are not Jewish, so we can teach them about Passover. We believe you should have a stranger at the table, that it's one of the things you are supposed to do."

Lauri's fond childhood memories include visiting with cousins who had lived in Japan. "At their seder table we enjoyed the matzah ball soup in authentic lacquered Japanese bowls."

Actress Marilyn Lightstone hosts the program Spoken Art on the Bravo channel. TV mogul Moses Znaimer is her "significant other."

Marilyn Lightstone

"Many members of my family celebrate the traditional festivities, but I think, at heart, I'm a pagan and I celebrate nature. According to some of the things I've

"In the last number of years I've taken to travelling. I usually come back with all kinds of presents, and anyone who comes to our seder gets one.

"At my seder the food is communal. Traditionally, I do the chicken soup, the eggplant, and the main course which is usually a chicken dish. Libby, Moses' sister, makes the knaidlach and the gefilte fish, and a friend makes the dessert."

Although her background is Ashkenazi, Marilyn has recently discovered Sephardi traditions. "I think it's eminently superior to the Ashkenazi in terms of food. The Ashkenazim lived in tiny little shtetls, and ate potatoes and onions. In Sephardi cooking, they have wonderful flavors, using fruits, vegetables, nuts, sauces, herbs and spices. They are a very sophisticated people."

Matthew Teitelbaum

The director of the Art Gallery of Ontario, Matthew Teitelbaum, says that this year they are having the first seder at home, and for the second seder they will go to his in-laws', as it alternates from year to year.

"I don't do any of the cooking, but I do a lot of the eating! We don't do [the seder] in a fully formal way, but it's certainly more structured than the tradition I was used to, growing up. My son Max is 7 and Elijah is 5."

Apparently Elijah gets a kick out of it whenever his name pops up throughout the holiday. The family plans to attend the services at the Junction Synagogue.

These products are the kosher finalists for the product award of this year's Canadian Fine Food Show, which will be held at the International Centre, April 11 to 13.

Spokesperson Richard Swayze told The CJN that this is the first year that kosher products have been featured at the fair, although there have been a few kosher foods shown over the years. In fact, Ceres' Secrets of the Valley Juice and Godiva Chocolates were among the 1998 finalists.

The kosher finalists are Lemeraire Dijon Mustard, distributed by Elco Fine Foods; Dynamic Chocolates' Seashell Treasures, Macadamia Seashells, and Milk Chocolate Truffles; and Faye's Finest Champagne Jelly, from Faye's Finest Inc.

Dry Bones

WELL, THEY REALLY TURNED UP THE HEAT ON US!
YOU'RE TALKING ABOUT THE BEZEQ WORKERS, THE ARYEH DERI VERDICT, THE TEACHER'S SANCTIONS...
...THE EU POSITION ON JERUSALEM, OR THE JORDANIAN RESPONSE TO OUR WATER POLICY?
ACTUALLY I WAS TALKING ABOUT THE WEATHER.

Justified and just

The demonstrations in this country against Canada's participation in the NATO action against Slobodan Milosevic's army must not deter the government from maintaining its policy. NATO's actions are justified and the government's policy is just.

The purpose of NATO's military intervention, it must be emphasized, is not to join the battle on the side of the Kosovars in their attempt to break away from Yugoslavia. Rather, it is to try to prevent the Yugoslav leader from exterminating the Kosovars.

Even as these words are being written, reports from Kosovo continue to tell a tale of extreme brutality against the ethnic Albanians there. Entire villages are being set to the torch, their inhabitants forced to flee ahead of the arrival of the marauding paramilitary gangs of Serbian thugs who plunder, loot, burn and murder.

Some critics of the NATO initiative contend that only the United Nations has the international legal authority to launch such military action. But their criticism is hollow, knowing as they do that the Russia would veto any UN military strike and thus prevent any attempt at rescuing the targeted Kosovars.

Other critics of the NATO action object that the allied forces have no moral or legal right to intervene in what they characterize as a wholly internal Yugoslavian dispute, thereby violating the inviolate territoriality of a sovereign nation state.

But this objection too is a shell that must be collapsed. There is no denying that Yugoslav sovereignty has been violated. But the sanctity of Yugoslav sovereignty weighs less on the scale of competing values than the sanctity of the lives of the countless thousands of Kosovars who are fleeing for their lives to avoid the slaughterers' knife. The attempt to negotiate a settlement of the dispute was an acknowledgment by the NATO alliance that Yugoslav sovereignty must indeed be respected – but not at all costs.

Once the Yugoslav leader rejected every diplomatic overture and every reasonable proposal to peacefully resolve the dispute, how were the lives of the ethnic Albanian Kosovars to be saved except by the use of force?

And is this in truth, not the paramount issue in the dispute now?

Are the lives of the ethnic Albanian Kosovars not to be saved?

Indifference to evil, in effect, is complicity with evil. After all the horrors and the brutalities let loose in this century by evil unchallenged, we must never again ever countenance such indifference, such complicity.

It is a humanitarian objective, not a military one, that NATO has undertaken to achieve in Yugoslavia. Canada is to be commended for participating.

The scandal of homelessness

Passover is a most fitting occasion for us to reflect upon the sorry plight of the homeless; it is a clarion proclaiming the inherent dignity of all mankind. It rouses us to rage against what Rabbi Dow Marmur forcefully describes elsewhere in these pages as "the scandal of homelessness." But rage unaccompanied by action will provide little comfort and even less shelter to those whom we must help.

The appointment last week by the federal government of Claudette Bradshaw as minister for the homeless was an important first step. But a first step is not yet a plan of action.

A humane, comprehensive plan of action will require wide intergovernmental consultation, adequate financial resources and the political will to restore to those unfortunate many the dignity that their homelessness has injured.

Overcoming Ibsen requires "poetical spirit"

The contents of your editorials and your articles, in general, concerning the development and evolution of politics and religion in Israel, bring to mind a 100-year-old comment by Henrik Ibsen that has deeply troubled me for many years:

"The state is anathema to the individual. How does a state acquire its political strength? By absorbing the individual into [its] political and geographical idea… "And on the other hand, take the Jewish people, the aristocracy of the human race – how is it they have preserved their unique identity, their poetical spirit amid surroundings of coarse cruelty? By having no state to burden them. Had they remained in Palestine, they would long ago have lost their individuality in the process of building their nation – like all other nations." (editorial licence used to clarify translation).

For me, that "unique identity [and] poetical spirit" are the very essence of Judaism – from Abraham, to Moses, to Solomon, Isaiah, Hillel, Akiva, Maimonides, Nachman of Breslov. And I am deeply troubled by what I see emerging within the State of Israel: hostility, fanaticism, disrespect, intolerance, self-righteousness, violence – all those qualities that are the exact opposite of poetic spirit.

It may not be an easy task to surmount Ibsen's prognostication, but I think of it as our destiny and responsibility as Jews, the essence of our unique identity.

Needs of Holocaust survivors are ignored

I agree with D.M. Schonberger (CJN, Dec. 24) that the remarks of Irving Abella were deeply offensive. To refer to the Holocaust as a "metaphor" in education (CJN, Dec. 3), whatever his meaning, is an insult to all of us who lost members of our family. Unfortunately his insensitive words reflect the attitude of an elite group of Jewish leaders, who for many years avoided Holocaust education, as if it had never happened, and later appeared to use it as a bargaining position.

For this reason, many of us who returned from the services in 1945, remained ignorant of the mass killings in Nazi death camps until years later.

It is no wonder that leaders capable of seeing the Holocaust simply as a metaphor have little empathy or concern for the welfare of survivors, most of whom were people with real and immediate needs. The larger question that should be addressed then, appears to be: "Who should speak for the Canadian Jewish community?" Diaspora Jews are not a nation with democratically elected leaders, and it seems clear that the policies and practices of our self-appointed ones do not represent the best and most humane principles of our people.

Now of course, Abella can proudly state, "It would be inappropriate to end the 20th century arguing over how to divvy up assets." Does he mean that the struggle to make ends meet for needy Holocaust survivors would be inappropriate after 1999? Or that those who have robbed them are now fighting over the spoils?

Globe and Mail had hidden agenda on Dueck

Kudos and more to your editorialist for the piece (CJN, Mar. 4), condemning the cowardly article written by the Globe and Mail on the Johann Dueck case and the government's Nazi war criminal prosecution/deportation efforts.

It is almost impossible to escape the conclusion that the feature article on Johann Dueck that appeared in mid-February in the Globe and Mail, was printed with the full understanding that it would bring anti-Jewish elements in Canada out of the woodwork and onto the letters-to-the-editor pages of the Globe. My guess is that the Globe editors felt they erred in giving extensive and favorable coverage to Jean Chrétien's visit to Auschwitz with the Ronen family. These editors were surely startled by a barrage of hurtful, prejudiced letters from Canadians of Polish descent decrying the "overemphasis" on the Jewish tragedy at the death camp.

Needs $15 daily to satisfy panhandlers

Re: Rabbi Gunther Plaut's article, "Outlawing the Panhandlers." (CJN, Mar. 11).

Tzedakah is a mitzvah of the highest order, but certainly a choice must be considered by the provider. The good rabbi obviously does not live in the downtown core of Toronto where panhandlers thrive. The many I meet on a daily basis are not interested in a cup of coffee or food, just money. One would have to carry $15 to $20 in change daily, to satisfy the mitzvah of tzedakah in downtown Toronto.

This does not address the real problem affecting the poor and homeless. Intelligent constructive social legislation must be enacted before the situation becomes overwhelming.

The true and ultimate meaning of Pesach

By RABBI REUVEN P. BULKA

Passover is the period of time when we recall and relive our ancestors' enslavement and their having been redeemed from bondage.

Bond-age. That is an ugly word. But bond-ing, is a lovely word. What is the difference? In bonding, we are tied voluntarily to someone else in a meaningful relationship of friendship and trust. In bondage, we are tied to someone else against our will, in a distorted relationship of exploitation and horrible manipulation.

At the seder, we say, Avadim hayinu. We were slaves. To be an eved is to be in bondage. But to be an eved of God, to be a servant of God, is the highest form of bonding. A small nuance, but what a large distinction!

We relive the Exodus on Passover in order to move from bondage to bonding: bonding specifically with God.

There are many ways to bond with God. One way, which we unfortunately tend to overlook, is via bonding with God's creations, with our fellows. Though it often escapes us that we can connect to God by connecting to other humans, it cannot escape us that by disconnecting and antagonizing others, we antagonize and disconnect from God.

In this context, I share some reflections on my most recent trip to Israel, a few weeks ago. My plane landed just a few hours after the, by now, famous and humongous haredi rally and secular counter-rally in Jerusalem. By the time I arrived in Jerusalem, there was hardly a visible reminder that anything so massive had transpired just a bit earlier.

But there is no one who doubts that the impact of this event will be felt in Israel for a long time. The question is, what will that impact be? As the adept spin-meisters of politics will testify, it all depends on what "spin" we give to the event.

I do not feel comfortable being critical because I do not reside in Israel. And to be blunt, criticism usually is taken personally and adversely, and usually dismissed. There is much about which to be critical, but there is also much about which to be optimistic regarding the rally and counter-rally of recent vintage.

"The two sides (secular and haredi) share more than we realize."

[Jacob El-Baz photos]

Those who accuse me of being naively hopeful are correct, but I prefer this to a logic-based negativity which breeds hopelessness. Bear with me, as I share with you some thoughts on the light in the middle of the tunnel.

First, crazy as it may sound, I was delighted that there was a counter-demonstration. It showed that the "other side" cares very deeply about Israel. If there had been no reaction, that would have testified to a very dangerous level of apathy about Israel's future. We have long heard dire warnings about a reduced affection for Israel in the younger generation of secular Israelis; so the fact that they were there, 50,000 strong, is a positive sign.

This conglomerate of events was billed as the Haredim vs. the secular. But the two sides share more than we realize. Both, thankfully, care very deeply about Israel, and are committed to its future. The secular, though they might be horrified to find this out, are also haredi.

Haredi, the word, means anxious, concerned, worried. In its most immediate incarnation, it probably is most accurately translated as vigilance. Vigilance is the natural end result of being anxious, concerned and worried.

So the secular who demonstrated, and those who would have liked to but could not, evince a "haredi-ness" about Israel's future. Their vision of Israel is different, maybe even radically different, from the vision of their counterparts. But it helps us all to realize that these are shared concerns that diverge philosophically but converge on the essential matter of love for Israel.

Most secular Israelis that I know fully, espouse the Jewishness of Israel. They appreciate the passion, the zeal, the love, that emanates from many, in fact, most religious Jews. Religious Jews need to know this. They also need to know and to appreciate that thousands of so-called secular Jews gave their lives for the State of Israel, and many more were, and continue to be, ready to do the same should it tragically become necessary.

And yes, secular taxes have made it possible for Torah institutions to flourish in Israel at a level that is beyond astounding.

The two communities are not as far apart as it may seem. But there is definitely a need to heal serious ruptures between them. The perceptions that each community harbors about the other are where the action must start. And the weaknesses that prevail in the respective communities must be addressed by the communities themselves, not by each hurling epithets about the other.

The haredi community needs to ask why, after all these years, it has not created a better feeling about religion among the secular. The secular need to ask why, after all these years, their dedication and commitment to Israel have not filtered down effectively to their children.

If each of these communities will seek guidance from the other on where they may have gone wrong, much can be corrected before it is too late. But it can only happen with an honest willingness to admit failings and to seek remedies.

Rabbi Reuven Bulka

To the Haredim, whose passion for mitzvah fulfilment is unmatched, let me humbly make a small suggestion. For the next year, why not make the fundamental mitzvah of "love your fellow as yourself" (the bonding mitzvah!), the mitzvah that you will endow with your legendary zeal and boundless energy. Think of the impact this would have on Israeli society.

Let the Haredim try this for a year. I am convinced that once they try it, they, and the secular Israelis, will be so enthralled that the mitzvah will perpetuate, as it should and must.

Thus, haredi Jews concerned about cars driving through their neighborhoods should invite these very people to their homes to enjoy Shabbat together, instead of using other, less effective and more incendiary means to express their displeasure with the drivers. This can be, and should be, generalized as the approach for all matters that divide the communities, not only in Israel, but everywhere.

There is plenty to build on for the future. I would love for the haredi community to have a second demonstration. But for this show of strength, I would love them to invite all Israelis, with special emphasis on the secular community, to join them, to bond in prayer and resolve. That would be a wonderful show of strength, the strength referred to by the talmudic sages that is manifested when one turns a foe into a friend, when one transmutes hatred into love.

It would be a most welcome spin on the first demonstration, a spin that would be felt with warmth in all Israeli and Jewish circles.

But the road to such an event starts with our proper appreciation of the true and ultimate meaning of Pesach, what we do with our freedom and how we bond with our past, present, and future.

Rabbi Reuven Bulka is spiritual leader of Congregation Machzikei Hadas in Ottawa, and was recently the first Canadian rabbi to become chair of the State of Israel Bonds Rabbinic Cabinet.

Opinions

Away from home for the seders

It's that time of year again. Time to root through the basement looking for the extra sets of dishes, utensils, pot and pans.

Time to fill the cupboard with food in green and orange packages. Time to find new ways of observing Passover without having to actually eat matzah.

Jennifer Fox in Halifax

Like most Jews I know, I can't stand eating matzah. It's dry, it's crumbly and it's impossible to spread anything on it without it breaking.

The only people I know who enjoy eating matzah are non-Jews.

My roommate is excited that Passover is near because she enjoys the taste of our unleavened bread. Taste, what taste? I can't describe what matzah tastes like because I've come to believe that it doesn't have one. I think the 160 days of my life that I've spent eating the stuff has deadened my taste buds. If it has a taste, then I'll find it.

The absolutely worst thing about matzah is that it's not transportable. Year after year, I would take sandwiches of matzah and cream cheese to school. Though my sandwich would be tightly wrapped in layer upon layer of tin foil to prevent it from breaking, by the time lunch rolled around, it would be fractured in a hundred places, and soggy. I praise the person who invented kosher for Passover bagels.

My mom has sent me a box full of Passover food. Two boxes of egg matzah; three cans of chocolate chip macaroons; one box of instant Passover hot cereal, and plastic forks, knives, spoons and plates, which will hopefully sustain me for the eight days.

It's cheaper to have kosher for Passover food shipped in from Toronto than buying it in Halifax. The grocery store here has little to no selection and the price of a jar of gefilte fish would feed my entire house for a month. OK, maybe not for a month, but I have schoolbooks that cost less than these six pieces of fish.

I sound bitter, I know, but the Passover seder is one of my favorite times of the year. The three children of my family haven't all lived in the same house since I was 12 years old. But every spring, my brother and sister would return home from university so we could all sit down together as a family and retell the story of how our ancestors were freed from Egypt.

Passover is also the only time of the year when I'm willing to sing in public. I am, unfortunately, the youngest member of my family, siblings and cousins included. This means I must sing the Four Questions every year, even though I think I have a voice like a rusty hinge. My parents tell me I sound beautiful; I think they're tone deaf. Luckily, my cousins now have children, and I think it will only be a few more years until I can retire from my Four Question duties.

It's all the family traditions I will think of when I celebrate Passover this year in Halifax. It will be the second year now that I'll be spending the seders without my family. Though I will attend a student seder, and a generous Haligonian household will take me into their home and feed me, it's not the same.

Passover isn't Passover until I whine that I never find the afikoman, or until my mother asks, "How many matzah balls do you want in your soup?" Passover isn't Passover unless it's with my family. Now it's just the one week of the year when I eat tasteless crackers.

The real significance of Passover

Passover is coming. Bring out the matzah. Greet your family. Tell the story. Sing the songs. Drink the wine. Welcome Eliyahu. But don't forget to close the door after he enters the room and sips down the wine that was left for him.

Erica Horn in Montreal

It has been my experience that often during Passover, people forget what is important about the holiday and focus on other, more trivial elements. It seems that people expend unnecessary time deciding or arguing about which night they will make seder and who will be invited.

While family feuds and other crises can occur throughout the year, Passover seems to be the buzzword for breakdowns, grudges and complications. A simple game of word association will demonstrate my observation:

Passover: Matzah – tasteless. It's hard to cook on Passover – Who will make seder? I don't want to – it's too complicated. Where will we go? – We want to be with our family. I'll make it, but you bring the gefilte fish – Oh, but I already bought the fish, and so forth.

The purpose of Passover is to celebrate the Exodus from Egypt with family and friends. It is a time to enjoy good company, to sing the songs we now know by heart, and to realize how fortunate we are on the other days of the year that we don't have to stare at sealed off or practically empty pantries, and feel deprived of food we hold so dear.

Moreover, for those of us old enough (grandparents and uncles seem to experience difficulty distinguishing between those who are indeed old enough and those who aren't) it's a time to get a little "pickled" from four cups of wine (and when the head of the table loses count…).

Passover is a reminder of the importance of fighting for freedom and salvation in every generation, and it is a celebration of the Israelites' redemption from the Egyptian house of bondage.

While the holiday conjures up more restrictions than allowances, and more disagreements than can be avoided, people lose sight of its intentions and fall into the booby trap of prohibitions. Just because we can't eat bread, our favorite chocolate cake, or even drink our regular milk, doesn't mean we are given the warrant to break down the fortified walls of the importance of family, unity and humanity.

Furthermore, Passover politics sets a bad example for the younger generation. We cannot start assigning less than favorable adjectival names to family members who forget to send flowers, serve tasteless macaroons, or forget to close the door behind Eliyahu, let in a draft and plague the family with pneumonia and colds.

The theme of the Israelites being freed from bondage has provided us with a reason to rejoice and to be together. What purpose do family disputes serve? The longer they persist, the more negative the perception of Passover will become. Children will grow up associating Passover with dreaded family meals and warped memories of happy times gone sour, all because our parents have forgotten to don their value caps and gowns.

At the seder, we dip a green vegetable and/or an egg in salt water to serve as a reminder of bitter times. Forty years from now, who's to say that our grandchildren won't be mistaking this tradition for a reminder of how their ancestors were too caught up in family feuds to actually teach their children the real significance of the holiday?

'Careful, they steal children!'

When I was a small boy and visited my grandparents' home in Muenster, in West Germany, my grandmother often warned me, "If you're not good, the Gypsies will come and steal you."

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

I wasn't quite sure who Gypsies were, but the threat was frightening enough because I did not want to be abducted. Only much later did I learn about the people who constituted the basis of grandma's threat. They suffered terrible discrimination, not unlike that of the Jews, and have experienced their own Holocaust as well. Pesach is a good time to think about them. Freedom has many faces!

Gypsies is a term that should, in fact, no longer be used, because it has an underlying derogatory meaning. The people it means to describe should be referred to as Roma, and their history has certain resemblances to our own.

At the present time, the Roma count some eight million in Europe and form the largest single minority group on the continent.

They arrived about 500 years ago from Asia, and a quick look at their experience in Europe will evoke familiar memories in the reader:

In 1496, a German edict declared Roma to be traitors to Christianty; a few years later, Louis XII forbade them from entering France; and until late in the last century, they lived as slaves in Romania. The Nazis – not to be outdone by anyone else – issued an edict which concluded that "the Roma question must be treated as a racial one." Subsequently half a million of them were exterminated.

But prejudice, as we Jews know, survives for a long time. As late as 1997, when several hundred Roma from Czechoslovakia and Romania sought asylum in Britain, even mainstream newspapers had headlines such as these: "Gypsies invade Dover hoping for a handout," or "They speak little English but know exactly how to play the system." Lines such as these have been used for Jews for hundreds of years.

Today, the Roma are scattered across Europe, and their largest communities are found in central and eastern Europe. The magazine Refugees, published by the United Nations in Geneva, reaches this conclusion: "They seem to face a common antipathy and fear, branded as ruthless wanderers, illiterate, dirty and even dangerous." That's the way Jews were described and denigrated not too long ago, and going by recent figures published in the Canadian Press in 1999, Jews are still the second largest group who suffer attacks from others. Only blacks have greater reason to complain.

There's an old saying that no one is truly free as long as others are in chains. I feel that way about the Roma. I don't know any of them personally, but I have read enough about them to know that they deserve more attention from us than perhaps any other group that is being persecuted at this time.

At Pesach time, I would like to see, not so much a Roma campaign, as merely a Roma awareness. It will make our sense of freedom and gratitude more cogent and more legitimate. Chag Samayach.

Muscle and moxie — Tough Jews loomed large

The very idea of a Jewish gangster, muscling and shooting his way into notoriety, seems incongruous today when Jews are being appointed presidents of major American corporations and Ivy League universities.

But for approximately three generations, until about 1945, the image of the Jewish mobster was indelibly etched into the consciousness of a nation.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

From Arnold Rothstein and Abe "Kid Twist" Reles to Louis (Lepke) Buchalter and Ben (Bugsy) Siegel, the figure of the Jewish hoodlum loomed large, and even somewhat romantically, in the pages of the yellow press and in popular folklore. These gangsters, hard and heartless and morally repugnant though they were, shattered ethnic shibboleths and stereotypes of the meek, milquetoast, submissive Jew.

Long after they had vanished from the scene, these tough, fearless Jews with guns, knives, ice picks and brass knuckles served as something of a counterpoint to the weak, defenceless, hapless Jews who perished in the Holocaust.

Given their almost legendary status, it is hardly surprising that writers have gravitated toward them like moths to a light bulb. Irving Howe, in World of Our Fathers (1976), took note of them, and Robert Lacey delved into their peculiar universe in Little Man: Meyer Lansky and the Gangster Life (1991).

Rich Cohen, in Tough Jews (Simon & Schuster), is the latest chronicler to plow this furrowed field of sociological inquiry. His is not a straightforward history of the Jewish mob, but rather a highly personal and impressionistic take of it as viewed through the eyes of his father and his friends.

Cohen's dad, as well as his chums, were raised in New York City districts - Bensonhurst, Flatbush and Brownsville - where these mobsters roamed.

"The Jewish gangster stories told each morning by my father and his friends," writes Cohen, "are really the remnants of the old neighborhood stories, legends that have been passed from clubrooms and street corners to boardrooms and delis and on to suburban towns, like the one where I grew up."

By his reckoning, the first "truly famous" Jewish gangster was Monk Eastman, whose real name was Edward Osterman. Born in Williamsburg, Brooklyn, now a Chassidic enclave, Eastman was the wayward son of a middle class restaurateur who sold a pet shop he had inherited to become a bouncer in a nightclub.

From there, he drifted into crime, gathering around him a coterie of Lower East Side Jewish thugs whose stock in trade was robbery. After bungling a holdup, he was dispatched to Sing Sing in 1904, and in his absence, a succession of Jewish gang leaders emerged, ranging from Big Jack Zelig to Dopey Benny Fein.

Released from prison in 1916, Eastman worked as a sneak thief, pickpocket and dope peddler. In 1917, he enlisted in the U.S. army, and on the battlefields of France, he acquitted himself as a hero. Unable to adjust to civilian life after the war, he returned to his bad old ways. In 1920, he was found dead in front of a cafe, having been shot five times. Eastman was buried with military honors.

Eastman's demise not only spelled finis to a gangster era, but ushered in a new epoch briefly dominated by Arnold Rothstein. A pampered rich man's son from Manhattan, Rothstein was fascinated by the seedy world of card and dice games which lay far beyond his ken. He was an inveterate gambler who befriended Big Tim Sullivan, the Irish political boss of the Lower East Side. "This is one of my smart young Jew boys," Sullivan proudly boasted when referring to his protége.

With Sullivan's protection, Rothstein, the putative model for F. Scott Fitzgerald's character Meyer Wolfsheim in The Great Gatsby, opened an opulent midtown casino. Having accumulated sufficient capital, Rothstein blossomed into the financier of the underworld.

They called him Ph.G.: Pappa has gelt. Rothstein was involved in the drug and in the illicit liquor trade. He also fixed fights, and, it's rumored, the 1919 World Series.

And while no one quite like him ever appeared again after his murder in 1928, the streets of urban America continued to produce a succession of colorful and menacing Jewish hoods.

In Cohen's father's judgment, the "greatest" of all the old gangsters was Abe Reles. Fleeing pogroms, Reles' father, a Galician Jew, reached Ellis Island - the gateway to America - in the early 1900s.

When he was 12, Reles left school, turning to petty crime. Soon, he was "enforcing discipline" - performing contract killings - for the infamous Syndicate, established by Italian mobsters in 1931 to keep the peace and apportion criminal turf.

When Reles turned state's evidence, much to the rage of the mob and much to the delight of U.S. prosecutor Tom Dewy, he sealed his fate. Although he was protected by a phalanx of 16 policemen, Reles suspiciously fell five storeys to his death from the window of a hotel in Coney Island.

In the pantheon of gangsterdom, Louis (Lepke) Buchalter was a singularly sinister figure, the man behind Murder Inc. The scion of Russian Jewish immigrants, he was the product of a broken family. Bereft of parental guidance, he fell in with a group of Jewish hoods who led him astray. In the mid-1920s, Rothstein recruited him as a "soldier."

With Rothstein's demise, Buchalter inherited his drug operation. Diversifying his base, he infiltrated and corrupted trade unions in the garment industry, and was not averse to physically eliminating scores of rivals.

In 1944, Buchalter's luck finally ran out. Refusing to cut a deal with prosecutors after his arrest, he was executed in the electric chair, the only high-level boss in mob history to receive the death penalty.

No book worth its salt on the mob would be complete without at least a reference to Arthur Flegenheimer (aka Dutch Schultz) and Meyer Lansky. In Tough Jews, Cohen elaborates upon their respective criminal careers.

Schultz was one of Rothstein's boys, riding shotgun on his whiskey trucks during Prohibition. With Rothstein's murder, he formed his own gang, consisting primarily of hooligans like Bo Weinberg, Abbadabba Berman and Lulu Rosenkrantz.

In the wake of Prohibition, Schultz entered the rackets, extorting money from Manhattan's swankiest restaurants and raking in huge profits from Harlem's numbers game.

According to Cohen, Schultz was perhaps New York City's "most visible" gangster in the 1930s. But when he outlived his usefulness, he was mercilessly gunned down. His hired assassins were Jews.

Renowned as the "brains" of the Syndicate, Lansky was one of the first Jewish mobsters to form alliances with Italian gangsters, notably Charles (Lucky) Luciano. Toward the end of his life, Lansky was a fugitive from justice, forced to leave Israel, his temporary haven, by the long arm of the American government.

Law enforcement official Ralph Salerno believes that "Italian gangs with Jewish friends" had an edge over their competitors. They were swayed by the prospect of gain and not blinded by racism. Cohen quotes him as saying: "The Genovese family, the Gambino family, they had Jewish friends and prospered. What did they care about a guy's religion? Do you like him? Do you trust him? Can you make money with him? That's all that matters."

There is a large grain of truth in the simplicity of these words.

Israel's Sephardi election

By AVI BENLOLO

At no other time in Israel's political history have there been so many Sephardi politicians poised to help govern the state as there are in this coming election on May 17.

Israeli Sephardim can no longer be viewed as an underclass, but rather as part of an emerging governing-class. This is evident if one examines the ranking of Sephardi candidates on the electoral lists of the major parties including, Labor, Likud, the new centre and Shas.

The Labor party has made a dramatic shift; historically its top candidates were mainly of east European descent, or Ashkenazim. Realizing the party's lack of representation within the Sephardi community, Labor leader Ehud Barak appointed David Levy and Dr. Shlomo Ben Ami to third and fourth place respectively on the electoral list.

A veteran of Israeli politics, Levy realized his Gesher party might not survive this election and so he accepted Barak's offer to follow Shimon Peres on the party list. Levy's most distinct attribute is that he is respected by working class Sephardim who can identify with his Moroccan heritage. They are aware that like them, he too came from a lower socio-economic group.

On the other hand, Ben Ami represents Sephardim who have succeeded in Israeli society – the upper class. Born in Morocco and raised in Kiryat Shmona, Ben Ami became a professor at Hebrew University.

Benjamin Netanyahu's Likud party has historically been much more inclusive of Sephardim. Nevertheless, it is interesting to note that the three top spots following the prime minister are occupied by Sephardim in the following order: Tunisian-born Silvan Shalom currently minister of Science and Technology; Meir Shitrit who is an emerging figure and represents Moroccan young leadership; and finally, Iranian-born Moshe Katzav, who now serves as minister of tourism and deputy prime minister.

The new centre party,which is still without a platform but a threat to Labor and Likud, is led by Yitzhak Mordechai. Born in Kurdistan and a traditional Sephardi Jew, Mordechai served as a major general in the IDF. He resigned from Likud as minister of defence in January to help form the centre party.

Finally, the political party to watch most in these elections is Shas, the self-proclaimed Sephardi party. Lead by Rabbi Aryeh Deri and backed by Rabbi Ovadia Yoseph, its spiritual leader, the party won four seats in its first election in 1984. Shas quickly rose to 10 seats in the 1996 elections. Although sometimes perceived as a religious party, Shas attracts traditional Sephardi Jews who can best be described as moderate in their religious and political views.

The party began as a grass-roots movement establishing an organization called El Hamayan (to the source) which caters to the social needs of lower income Sephardi families.

El Hamayan provides child care services to working parents, social assistance to families and educational programs for school children. Shas was clearly able to capture votes through the work of El Hamayan.

Clearly, the major political parties in Israel have targeted the Sephardi vote. The fact that so many key Sephardi figures are at the top of their respective party's electoral list makes it evident that the Sephardi community plays a major role in this election.

Counting of the Omer

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

It's somewhat ironic that on the second night of Pesach, with the holiday barely underway, Jews are already beginning to prepare themselves for yet another festival. Thursday night marks Day 1 of sefirat haOmer, the counting of the Omer, which culminates in seven weeks with Shavuot. This period is a fascinating one, long associated with spiritual, even kabbalistic growth.

Just what is an omer? According to the Torah, an offering consisting of an omer (a specific measure) of barley was brought to the Temple on the second day of Passover [http://www.virtual.co.il./city_services/holidays/lagbaomer/omer.htm].

Until that offering was made, no grain from the new year's crop was to be eaten. From that day onwards, it was necessary to count 49 days until Shavuot – the Feast of the Wheat Harvest (Leviticus 23:15) [http://bible.ort.org/bible/htm/leviticu/torah/23152316.htm].

After the destruction of the Temple, the practice of bringing barley was discontinued, but Jews continued to count the Omer period.

The Ohr Somayach site calls this period a spiritual journey of 49 Steps [http://www.virtual.co.il/education/education/ohr/special/omer/index.htm].

The Kabbalists' interpretation of the Omer was based on the various permutations (7 x 7) of the sefirot or mystical emanations. These sefirot denote the ascent from the 49 "gates" of impurity of the Egyptian bondage to the purity of the revelation at Sinai. You can listen to three online lectures about the deeper significance of sefirat haOmer at 613.org [http://www.613.org/shavuot.html].

How do you keep your days straight throughout the 49 days of counting?

Download a program to keep track of time for you. Windows users can download the free sefira program courtesy of Chabad [http://www.chabad.org/software/index.html]. Mac users can try out Doron Shalmon's MacSefira [http://www.eclipse.net/~ohavemeth/MacSefira/]. This program is shareware, but the author promises to donate all proceeds to tzedakah. And Virtual Jerusalem will send you a daily e-mail to help keep track of the proper day [http://www.virtual.co.il/city_services/holidays/pesach/count.htm].

Their site also has instructions about how to do the count, as does Project Genesis at [http://www.torah.org/learning/yomtov/omer/sefira.html] and [http://www.torah.org/learning/rambam/special/mt.sp.1.3.html].

The best program I have come across to help you keep track of the count will create a full Jewish calendar right on your Internet browser. Havienu L'Shalom's Hebrew Calendar is a remarkable piece of work [http://www.knowledgengineers.com/Havienu/html/ndx_vs.html]. You can generate and print a calendar complete with the Omer count, holidays and Shabbat readings. Click on your city's name (or enter your longitude and latitude) and the calendar will even calculate local candle lighting and havdalah times. Please note there may be some discrepancy between Havienu's candlelighting times and the one supplied by your neighborhood synagogue.

The Omer season has been associated with many national tragedies; so it has become the custom to refrain from holding public celebrations during this period. Eliezer Segal looks at the various tragic events which have occurred during sefirat haOmer and looks at related prohibitions such as wearing new clothes and getting married [http://www.acs.ucalgary.ca/~elsegal/Shokel/Calendar_Index.html#Omer].

However, if you have invested in an engagement ring, there's no excuse to procrastinate. You don't have to wait until the Omer period is over to give it to your fiancée [http://www.ohr.org.il/ask/ask063.htm#Q3].

Midrashic Moments

Layers of meaning

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

As Passover nears, the entire Jewish people enter a phase I term seder madness. This is the time Jewish families rush to prepare for a dinner ritual that is both foreign in its complexity and beautiful in its simplicity.

Passover is the holiday of freedom and the celebration of spring. The seders have us re-live our slavery, which we commemorate with an abundance of food. It can best be termed a holiday of layers, layers which appear in every aspect of the holiday.

One example is seen in what we assume to be the simplest element of the seder: the Four Questions. The youngest person at the seder asks what appear to be four questions about the strangeness of the ritual that is unfolding at the table.

Generally we all look forward to the time when the youngest child has their moment in the spotlight – their unique moment of expressing their Jewishness. During all the other holidays we try to include our children so they can connect and feel part of Jewish ritual.

However, this night is different. On this night the ritual cannot continue unless the youngest among us is active and has their moment. We are not striving to include them, because the seder has made it essential that they participate. We listen closely as they sing the Four Questions. The parents and grandparents beam with pride and the slightly older children remember years gone by when they had their moments. Siblings help if the youngest child falters, and they have now become the experienced mentors, even though they themselves are still children. This is the first layer.

The second layer appears when we take a close look at these questions, for in fact they are not four questions. The child asks: "Why is this night different than all other nights?" and proceeds to itemize four ways in which this night appears different. There is really only one question with four perspectives on the question. It seems that the child is wondering about four aspects of the night, but in truth the child has asked one question: Why is the night different?

In this layer of the ritual, the seder is making an important point to the parents. There is never one question and consequently there can never be one answer. Every question has sub-questions; every observation has perspectives; every ritual has nuances.

When young children ask a question about Judaism, prompt them to ask another, prompt them to ask four. Answer the children in ways that address many questions so that the children can begin to build a portrait of their Judaism. An answer that encompasses only yes or no presents the child with a world of blacks and whites.

Judaism is a spectrum of colors and the seders offer us the range of questions, the multiplicity of answers and the layers of the complex and the simple.

Yad Vashem's 'list of lists'

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

Faced with a deadline of March 31, 1999, an army of some 1,200 data entry clerks, software technicians, Holocaust scholars and others, worked feverishly throughout the winter to computerize the names of three million or more Holocaust victims from a collection of documents at the Yad Vashem Holocaust Memorial in Jerusalem.

Spurred into action by an $8 million (US) allocation of funds from the Swiss Bankers Association and the World Jewish Congress, Yad Vashem officials initiated a massive mobilization of manpower, took over a whole floor in a Jerusalem office building, and rented more temporary space in Beersheva for the duration of the project.

The Swiss Bankers Association and the World Jewish Congress, acting jointly as the Volcker Commission, funded the project in order to attain a comprehensive list of names of Holocaust victims to compare with a list of dormant Swiss bank accounts that may have belonged to Jews killed by the Nazis during WWII.

Yad Vashem officials began to conceptualize such a project years ago, but only went into high gear after the Volcker Commission funding arrived in early January.

"It's a fascinating convergence of interests," said Yaacov Lozowick, director of the Yad Vashem archives. "We've been dreaming of this for a long time and would have done it at our own sedentary rate until the Volcker Commission came along and wanted it done right away. Yad Vashem could have lived with doing this over two years. But if it has to be done in three months, then so be it."

Yad Vashem has been collecting testimony from relatives of Holocaust victims since the early 1950s, and now has more than three million of the handwritten documents. Everyday for two months, workers fed some 50,000 pages of testimony into two high-speed scanners, while teams of data entry clerks worked around the clock to keyboard the pages, whose high-resolution scanned images appeared on their screens.

Recognizing the inevitability of transcription errors and difficulties in reading the Hebrew, English, Polish and other languages in which the pages of testimony were originally scrawled, Yad Vashem officials devised a thorough system of checks. Whenever a surname or place name was detected for the first time, for instance, that particular record was electronically sent upwards to a hierarchy of specialists, who checked it against thorough master lists that the institution has compiled over many years.

As part of its overall effort to compile a comprehensive computerized inventory of Holocaust victims, Yad Vashem has drawn up a master list of some 8,163 other lists of Holocaust victims, containing a total of more than 12 million occurrences of names.

Nearly 2,000 additional lists compiled by the International Tracing Service of the Red Cross contain an additional six million names, bringing the total on Yad Vashem's List of Lists to roughly 18 million occurrences of names on some 10,000 lists.

The lists include many duplicates – for instance, a Czech Jew who possessed a Generali life insurance policy, had a business confiscated, and was eventually deported to Theresienstadt and then Auschwitz or Dachau, might show up five times – but according to Lozowick, they make it possible, for the first time, to name at least five of the six million Jews who perished.

Yad Vashem is making every effort not to duplicate the smaller-scale computerization efforts of other institutions such as Steven Spielberg's Survivors of the Shoah Visual History Foundation and The United States Holocaust Museum and Memorial, Lozowick said. "Any of these institutions that give us the results of what they've done, we give them what we've done. It's a win-win situation."

So far, Yad Vashem has entered into cooperative arrangements with eight institutions, including the Bergen-Belsen Museum which has provided a list of 23,000 Jewish inmates, and the Swiss Federal Archives which has supplied a list of 24,000 names of Jews who entered Switzerland during the Nazi era.

Yad Vashem plans to make its computerized list of Holocaust victims easily accessible to the public, most likely via the Internet, before the end of 1999, Lozowick said.

Simcha Baskets Filled with Joy

Thanks to Jewish Women's Federation (JWF), a department of UJA Federation, families are adding new meaning to their special occasions by sharing their joy and good fortune with those in need.

The Simcha Basket project provides decorative centerpieces containing kosher food products which are then donated to community agencies for distribution to needy community members following the celebration. JWF volunteers give simcha planners guidelines for creating their own baskets, a list of professionals who can design the centerpieces and cards accompanying the baskets which explain the hosts' participation in the project.

"It's a wonderful way to enhance a celebration and to perform an important mitzvah," says Malka Lewittes-Pratzer, who displayed Simcha Baskets at her daughter's bat mitzvah last year. "Ariella and I felt it was a natural way of expressing community belonging and concern for others."

Project Chair Rochelle Reichert, who incorporated Simcha Baskets into her daughter Serena's bat mitzvah celebration in February, says she couldn't bear the thought of throwing away centerpieces after the party. "We saw this as a chance to perform tzedakah and teach our children about the true meaning of Jewish responsibility."

Now in its second year, the project has sent food contributions to Yad Chesed, Jewish Family and Child Service, Tomchei Shabbos, the Pride of Israel Food Bank and the National Council for Jewish Women. Reichert hopes increased efforts by volunteers to publicize Simcha Baskets in synagogues and schools will attract more participants. "So far all our success is due to word of mouth."

Serena Reichert

But Simcha Baskets are not only ideal for bar and bat mitzvahs, says Lewittes-Pratzer who is approaching large communal organizations and businesses about the project. "It's really something appropriate for almost any occasion."

"We are so grateful for these gifts," enthuses Naomi Greenberg, who helps put together food packages delivered to dozens of poor families every week. "Sometimes, when we're a little short, the items we receive from Simcha Baskets help us fill our boxes."

"Although these donations don't alleviate hunger by any means, we hope they help brighten someone's day and raise awareness about the issue," notes Danita Dubinsky-Aziza, who, along with Ellen Kachuck-Rosenbluth co-chairs JWF's Community Response Project, which spearheaded the initiative.

If you are planning an upcoming simcha and would like to receive a Simcha Basket information package call (416) 635-2883 ext. 135.

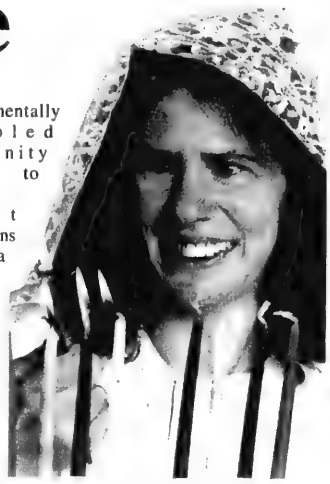
Reena Reinforces Jewish Life

At age 24, Todd Brooker is about to participate in his third Passover Seder. Todd, was born with severe developmental challenges and never had the opportunity to do so until two years ago when he became a client of Reena.

Brooker, blind from birth, moved from Ottawa to Toronto in 1996 after his mother Sharon won a long battle to secure a place for him in one of the agency's 22 group homes. "Now, Todd is able to celebrate all the Jewish holidays," explains Sharon.

Reena, established in 1973, provides housing, residential support, counseling, therapy and recreational programming for close to 1000 clients with developmental disabilities and their families. With financial assistance from UJA Federation, the agency also conducts extensive Judaic programming which includes client participation in community events, holiday celebrations, staff training, Kashrut in all group homes, assistance with Jewish lifecycle occasions and synagogue attendance.

New Jewish programming initiatives include increased community outreach, building links with synagogues and other communal organizations, such as Jewish Family and Child Service, to facilitate integration, and sending more developmentally disabled community members to Israel.



Last year, dozens of Reena clients participated in Israel at Fifty celebrations, including the Night of A Lifetime gala and UJA Federation's Israel at 50 Funwalk.

"UJA Federation is a symbol of our community, so it's natural for us to encourage our clients to participate in these kinds of events," says Sandy Keshen, Reena's Executive Director. "It gives them a great sense of inclusion and, at the same time, it exposes members of the community to our agency."

"We try to give our Jewish clients the opportunity to connect with the rest of the community and be exposed to Jewish tradition," stresses Arlene Margolis, Manager of Reena's Judaic Programming. "UJA Federation funding helps to train Reena staff – most of whom aren't Jewish," explains Margolis, whose training seminars focus on maintaining a Jewish household, festival observances and meal preparation. "We also encourage our staff to accompany their clients to synagogue," she adds.

This week, Passover Seders will be held in five Reena group homes across the city.

"Reena has always made quality of Jewish life a top priority," says agency Chair Stanley Kugelmass. "It's about pursuing the highest ideals of Judaism – tzedakah."

"UJA Federation supports Judaic programming at Reena because it recognizes that this population is an important part of our community," adds UJA Federation Social Planning and Allocations Committee member Ruth Ladovsky.

Coming Together in Toronto

B'yachad - togetherness - is the theme of the third bi-annual Canadian Young Leadership Conference at Toronto's Inn On the Park Hotel, April 9-11.

The weekend conference, sponsored by UIA Federations Canada, will feature Emmy Award winning documentary film producer and director Simcha Jacobovici; Rabbi Elyse Goldstein, Director of the popular Kolel learning centre; Rabbi Danny Levine; Shira Herzog Middle East analyst; and noted professor and author Irving Abella.

Other program highlights include a kabbalat Shabbat ceremony and dinner, Saturday night Havdallah services followed by a party at a venue in the downtown core and a chance to meet Israeli young leadership delegates.

"It's a great opportunity for young Jewish adults to meet people from across the country, discuss relevant issues and re-discover their Jewish roots," says Joseph Benbasset, who is chairing the event with Heather Milstein. "People should take time out of their busy schedules to experience what promises to be an exhilarating couple of days," adds Benbasset, who participated in the International Young Leadership Conference in London, England last November and is active in UJA Federation's Young Leadership Cabinet in Toronto.

When Charlotte Sasto moved to Toronto from South Africa two days after her 70th birthday, she told her daughter that she would need only two months to find her place in the community. In fact, all it took for this young at heart 84 year-old, was one week.

"I've been a volunteer all my life," explains Charlotte, who is known as the "voice of the Jewish Book Fair," where she has been in charge of ticket sales and bookings for close to 15 years. "I began volunteering for the Book Fair just two days after I arrived in Toronto."

Although the Book Fair, held at the Bathurst Jewish Centre every November, occupies a special place in Charlotte's busy schedule, she also manages to keep up her remarkably steady pace for the remaining 11 months of the year.

Her full roster of volunteer activities includes teaching weekly arts and crafts classes and organizing other gatherings at the Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Creative Living; running bingo games and discussion groups at the B'nai Brith apartment building where she lives; and, livening up the lounge at Baycrest on Tuesday afternoons with tea and cookies for residents and their guests.

Charlotte, who held many leadership positions in Johannesburg, South Africa, including a 30 year term as chairperson of the Jewish Women's Benevolent Society, says "I was raised to care for others so I am just following my parents' example."

Now Charlotte is setting her own example for five grandchildren and four great grandchildren. In 1995 she was presented with the Mel Lastman Volunteer of the Year Award for her service at the Betel Centre, which she displays on her dining room table among her colourful crafts and delicately knit infant sweaters. "One day," she vows, "I'll give the award to my granddaughter."

Enjoying the blessings of Pesach

By MAURY KELMAN

As you read this, you are probably in the midst of frantic, and even more frantic, Pesach preparations.

Guest Voices

Each year it seems, people begin to prepare earlier and earlier for this eight-day festival. In fact, I'm aware of one family that got so tired of Pesach cleaning, with its concomitant dish rearrangement and pot moving, that they now keep Pesach all year round.

With all the focus upon cleaning, however, we must ensure that we do not neglect the key aspects of the holiday, namely macaroons and marshmallows. Each year, I study the eating patterns of Jews, and I have yet to see a Jew eat a marshmallow during the other 357 days of the year. Yet, come Pesach, every Jewish family must purchase a bag of fluffy, kosher for Passover marshmallows, and prominently display them in the cupboard right next to the 23 tins of chocolate, chocolate chip, chocolate watermelon, chocolate papaya and chocolate eggplant macaroons (usually left over from last year).

Furthermore, by no means do I mean to question the obligation to own old fruit slices, which thanks to great advances in nutrition, now contain only 94.8 percent chemical additives, and can keep for up to 12 years.

My own sweet memories of Passovers past centre around borscht. Oh, how I would yearn for those eight magical days when the borscht would flow freely, enveloping me in its regal red wonder. Growing up, we were only allowed borscht as a special treat on the Sabbath before a Wednesday new moon if it coincided with the Toronto Maple Leafs enjoying a three-game winning streak, which effectively left borscht banquets for those too swift Pesach days. The anticipation was palpable on Passover eve, and while short sighted Jews the world over compared their briskets and hens, I basked in borscht heaven.

Thank God, after years of counselling with Borschters Anonymous, I can now enjoy the occasional shot on Pesach without reverting to my former ways.

In fact, as I've grown older, I have come to appreciate other aspects of Pesach beyond food. While eating our M & M & Ms (matzot, macaroons and marshmallows) is clearly crucial, we must not forget the most important part of Pesach and all Jewish holidays.

The keys to happiness

Maimonides (this is the serious part now, so be forewarned) in Hilchot Yom Tov explains that a Jew who buys the most exquisite food, serves it on the most beautiful china, and drinks the most expensive French wine for the four cups, but does not invite any guests for the seder has made a mockery of the commandment to rejoice on the festivals. "This," Maimonides thunders, "is not happiness. This is your stomach's happiness."

As Rav Soloveitchik, one of this century's great rabbis, has explained, good meat and fine wine, while mandated on the festivals, are only tools given to mankind to unlock the keys to happiness. True happiness on Pesach occurs when, after enjoying a fine meal, we appreciate all of God's blessings in this world. It occurs when we find ourselves engrossed in a discussion upon the significance of the four sons, and can't wait to whisk back 4,000 years and experience the Exodus ourselves. True joy occurs when we recognize the great and little miracles that God performs, not only on Pesach, but each day of the year for ourselves and loved ones.

There is, however, one ingredient missing from this incomparable recipe of physical bounty and spiritual yearning, without which the recipe borders on the unkosher. As Maimonides points out at the end of the Laws of Megillah (Purim), "there is no greater and more beautiful happiness than to cause the needy, orphans, widows and strangers to rejoice. In fact, whoever raises their hearts to happiness can be compared to God."

It is difficult to find a more succinct and poignant way of expressing our responsibility to reach out to all Jews during the holidays, and in fact all year round. Let us resolve to ensure that no Jew during Pesach lacks a place to eat or a home where he or she can find comfort. Look around your work place. Look around your neighborhood. Look anywhere you can find a Jew. Introduce yourself. Smile. Extend an invitation for a meal.

If all of us are as meticulous in this crucial area as we are in our cleaning and food preparation, surely the entire Jewish people will be rewarded with not only a joyous Pesach but also a future filled with peace, success and true happiness.

Maury Kelman is chair of Kedma, an international Jewish student organization.

TORONTO — In the past few weeks as people have been power shopping for Passover, Zareinu Educational Centre has been a grateful beneficiary.

Over 100 stores in the Toronto area accept Zareinu dollars – certificates in denominations of $10, $20 and $50 – that are bought at face value and used as cash.

Participating stores and services donate a percentage of the money back to Zareinu, to maintain therapies for special needs children, said Gloria Silver, Zareinu dollars program coordinator.

The centre serves about 60 special needs children from infancy through age 12, offering special education, physiotherapy, music, occupational and communication therapies. Students have a range of developmental and physical disorders including autism, Down syndrome and cerebral palsy.

Although there is a perception that the school is for Orthodox children only, the students reflect the entire spectrum of the Jewish community, said Silver.

Zareinu has four programs: infant intervention; junior and senior class (run as a nursery school, but with therapies); total communication program (TCP) for severely handicapped children; and, new this year, a more academically-oriented class for students with general learning disabilities. The latter two programs are run at Or Haemet Sephardic School; the former two at 4700 Bathurst St.

Zareinu dollars fund 10 to 15 percent of the school's operating budget, said Silver.

Although there is no additional cost to the customer who buys Zareinu dollars, sales – through the office and a team of 100 volunteers – had reached a plateau.

Silver attributed the slowdown, at least in part, to the increased use of debit cards, which preclude customers from exchanging cash for Zareinu dollars in stores where volunteers were stationed. "It's definitely had an impact on us," she said.

Late last year, Zareinu began accepting Visa and MasterCard in payment for Zareinu dollars. Although there is a charge of one percent, sales have picked up, particularly among people who accumulate air mile points with the use of their card, said Silver.

She offers delivery of Zareinu dollars if people phone in their credit card order.

The first certificates were printed in 1992, with a focus on stores in Jewish areas. Zareinu's customer base covers the area from Don Mills Road west to Dufferin Street, and from St. Clair Avenue north to Richmond Hill.

Participating merchants and services range from Act II Fine Jewellery to Zephyr Studios Inc., from Aleph Bet Judaica to the Zemer Orchestra. There is also a wide selection of supermarkets, restaurants and food stores, as well as gift, party goods and clothing stores and a number of professional services.

Silver was selling Zareinu dollars before she landed her present job in 1996. Her late parents were also active volunteer sellers at the IGA (then Food City) at Spring Farm Marketplace in Thornhill.

"Our philosophy is, if you're part of a community, you have to help a community," she said. Like Silver, over 90 percent of the volunteers do not have children at the school.

MATZAH MAGNETS

Students at USDS Bayview campus prepare matzah magnets, which they intend to sell to raise tzedakah for the Israel Cancer Research Fund. This is a self-directed project of the school's activity board committee, which meets one lunch time a week and is supervised by two teachers who devote their spare time. It is comprised of one child elected from each class, grades 3 through 5. Seen (from left) are Shanna Abramovitch, Mitchell Rattner, Shira Herzstein and Jamie Goldstein.

Educators urged to examine multiple intelligences

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
CJN Staff

TORONTO — Education should encompass a variety of methods in order to reflect children's different learning styles, says a leading Toronto educator.

Gail Baker, a co-founder of the Toronto Heschel School, and its director of general studies, recently spoke on multiple intelligences (MI) theory and its role in Jewish education, at the Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Synagogue, where the Heschel School is located.

Baker is a proponent of MI theory which essentially purports that there are many ways of being smart.

For example, one can have mathematical, linguistic, musical, athletic, and/or interpersonal intelligence, she said, noting that most people have a combination of intelligences.

A recognized expert on MI theory, Baker has recently given workshops on the subject at several U.S. Jewish education conferences, among them, the Coalition for the Advancement of Jewish Education (CAJE) and the Jewish Educators Assembly.

She said MI theory is a very current topic in education because it gives a broader view of how children learn; it is applicable to Jewish education because "educators are looking for ways of keeping children connected to Judaism for life.

"Educators recognize the need to deepen children's understanding of the text and Jewish culture so children will have a better chance of retaining the material."

She said traditionally, the tendency was to approach Jewish subjects in one way, and that "limited access to the material for many children.

Jewish subjects

"MI offers different avenues...It's a way of opening up a door in Jewish education that might not have been open before."

Baker said that traditional IQ tests, developed in the early 1900s, deal mainly with logical/mathematical and linguistic intelligences, but those tests are not designed to measure the other kinds of intelligences that people possess.

She cited the work of American professor Howard Gardner, the leading proponent of MI theory. A neuropsychologist from Harvard University, Gardner developed this theory after identifying at least seven different types of intelligence in the '70s and '80s.

She said those intelligences include linguistic, the ability to manipulate language; logical/mathematical; interpersonal, a well-developed understanding of other people and relationships; intrapersonal, the ability to have personal insight; spatial, the ability to imagine clear images and to perceive the visual/ spatial world accurately; bodily-kinesthetic, intelligence, expertise in using the whole body both athletically and expressively; and musical intelligence, the capacity to express musical forms.

Baker noted that Gardner recently identified an eighth intelligence – the naturalist, the ability to understand plants and animals and other aspects of nature.

Most people have blends of these intelligences, she explained.

"There is not one way of being smart. A cognitive profile is a combination of different intelligences. That's what makes individuals unique."

Baker stressed that MI theory is not an educational, but a psychological theory. "It's what we do with the theory that makes it educational theory."

The teacher's responsibility is to create a bridge between the various subject areas and the individual child's abilities, she said.

"Educators need to consider every child and their particular learning patterns if we want to unlock the potential of every student, and create life-long learners."

Move over maror, grappa can unblock those sinuses

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

I used to love the old adventure movies, where the partisans, spies or sullen villagers would sit in a cantina drinking grappa. The steely-eyed hero would drain it in one gulp while waiting for the innocent, yet determined blonde beauty.

I, of course, was the blonde beauty.

Well, recently I attended a wine tasting and kosher information seminar at Lorac Wine. And they served grappa.

Marketing director Michael Lennon explained that grappa is made by distilling the last pressing of the grapes. The result is a fiery, eye-watering drink, guaranteed to unblock the sinuses and keep the heart pumping.

The fact that it is kosher for Passover to boot is an added bonus.

Not surprisingly, most Passover wines are less dramatic. Carmel, for instance, which Lorac represents and supplies to the LCBO, now produces world class wines, according to Lorac's Carol Slatt.

This year, there are Chardonnays, Cabernet Sauvignons and Sauvignon blancs, ice wine (Carmel's Private Collection Muscat), Merlots, sparkling wines, and liqueurs.

You can even begin the seder with a Martini, with white vermouth Italiano.

Slatt explained that while most spirits are not acceptable for Passover, as they are made from grains, vodka may be permissible if it is made from potatoes or fruits. (Carmel's Vodka Stopka is made from fruit.)

What makes wine kosher, she told the seminar, is "supervision, supervision, supervision," from the picking of the grapes, through the crushing, processing and packing of the wine.

"The process [of making kosher and non-kosher wines] is otherwise identical, she said.

In a winery that produces both kosher and non-kosher wines, a team of about 10 people, led by a mashgiach, takes over the winery, until the wine is actually in the bottle, Slatt said.

The labels certifying that the wine is indeed kosher, are kept in sealed safes, which are opened by the mashgiach.

"Everyone involved in handling anything to do with the wine must be Sabbath observant," she noted.

Another consideration is whether or not the wines are mevushal (boiled). "A wine which is not mevushal may only be opened or served by a Sabbath observant Jew," Slatt said.

Until fairly recently, she said, wines were brought to a boil, and then allowed to cool. "This eradicated any fruitiness or taste in the wine," said Slatt. New technology allows flash cooling, and now there is barely any difference between mevushal and non-mevushal wines.

The final tasting was Partom, a port-like wine that is aged for 10 years in oak casks. A dessert wine, its sweetness and smoothness goes beautifully with fresh fruit.

Carmel also produces an extra virgin olive oil, which is available only through Lorac.

Many of the wines are in interesting and appealing bottles. Those looking for a novel gift for a seder host and hostess might consider grappa grappola, sold in a crystal hand blown bottle.

Now if only they would supply the steely-eyed hero too…

Associated '79 celebrates reunion

By SYLVIA PAPERNICK-BROOKE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — An enthusiastic crowd of 160 filled the social hall of the Labor Zionist Building at the recent reunion of Associated Hebrew Day Schools' class of '79.

Graduates and their spouses gathered to laugh and reminisce about their elementary and junior high-school days.

The reunion was the brainchild of graduate Karen Seidman.

Last fall, after meeting a former graduate at the shivah for their fellow classmate Ed Pollak, the two decided that it would be meaningful to catch up with other classmates, Seidman explained

It was done with the "purpose of getting together and seeing old friends and to try to do something for Eddie," she said.

The class has raised almost $1,000 in his memory, to be donated to Baycrest Geriatric Centre.

This event marked the first time in the 95-year history of Associated that a reunion for one specific class took place.

Friends playing catch-up

Seidman worked with five other graduates, putting together the evening within a few short months.

So many people were in attendance, little could be heard above the noise of the crowd, chatting to the strains of Stevie Wonder, Chicago and Blondie.

A trivia game which had been planned for the evening was never played, as people were too busy catching up with old friends and poring over old class pictures, scrapbooks and slides.

Among the events recalled, were the fashion and gong shows and the trip to Ottawa in Grade 9.

In conversations, it was discovered that many in the group are presently sending their children to Associated.

With the success of this first reunion there was talk about holding another. Leah Charney, one of the organizers, noted, "We spent a long time with these people and it was nice to reconnect with them and remember the time."

UJPO gets ready to hold third seder at Baycrest

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Children will scamper to find the afikoman, a cup of wine will be filled for Elijah, the four questions will be asked, but this third seder will also have a dash of politics.

About 300 people of all generations are expected to attend the seder sponsored by the Morris Winchevsky School and the United Jewish Peoples Order (UJPO). It will take place at the Wagman Centre of Baycrest Terrace on April 11 at 6 p.m.

The six-course dinner is open to the public, and last year's seder at the same location attracted many families who are not members of the school or of UJPO, said Maxine Hermolin, the school's executive director.

With a specially written Haggadah, lots of music and political messages interspersed at appropriate spots, the seder celebrates the Exodus of the Jews from slavery in Egypt and connects that event to current struggles for freedom.

Its spirit is exemplified at the start, when an orange is added to the plate with the well known traditional symbols.

The orange is explained by this passage in the Haggadah: "In recent times, a Jewish feminist speaker was challenged by a hostile listener claiming that women belong in positions of authority within the Jewish community just as much as an orange belongs on a seder plate. The speaker responded that like an orange on a seder plate, women's participation represents transformation, not transgression."

When the plagues are mentioned, the hope is expressed that the rule of Premier Mike Harris in Ontario and the tribulations he brought on the people will be ended with the next election.

Later, the Haggadah expresses the hope that the May 17 election in Israel will result in the recognition of the right of the Palestinians to self-determination, with two states for two peoples, to end the vicious cycle of violence and revenge.

A plea is made in the Haggadah to end the economic slavery of thousands of children in the Third World, and the poverty of children in Canada and the United States.

Rousing songs of defiance like Zog Nit Keyn Mol (Never Say!) and Shtill Di Nacht (Still the Night) will be sung by Dave Wall of the Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band and Ruby Rowan and Sarena Sairan, Winchevsky teachers, accompanied by Michael Blazer and the children of the school.

Each year the seder is led by a family within its community, and this year Roni Chaleff, Paul Freudenthaler and their sons, Adam and Leith, will lead the service.

Since the Winchevsky School has forged a link with the Shalom Food Project, a group of children from the food project families will be guests at the seder.

The cost is $32 for adults, $22 for children under 12, for members; and $35 for adults and $25 for children, who are non-members. For more information, phone 789-5502.

CIC asks Chrétien to explain remarks on Mideast policy.

CIC executive director Rob Ritter pointed out that Canadian policy "is based on direct negotiations between Israel and the Palestinians, and that the outcome of those negotiations should never be prejudged." Chrétien's statement, he said, seems to prejudge the outcome of bilateral talks.

"He's saying there should be negotiations, but that the negotiations should lead to a Palestinian state. So why are we negotiating?" Ritter said. "It's against the pattern [of Ottawa's policy] and we're absolutely opposed to that.

"We're definitely asking for an explanation."

Asked if he believes Israel should have the right to block the creation of a Palestinian state, Chrétien tempered his remarks somewhat by saying, "It is the policy of this government that we have to do it through negotiations, but it cannot be blocked forever. It has to come eventually to a resolution."

The prime minister said Canada supports the idea of a Palestinian state, but "all should be settled through negotiations between the parties in a civilized and peaceful manner."

Nevertheless, the CIC says Chrétien's remark represents "a fundamental deviation from traditional Canadian Middle East policy."

In his letter to the prime minister, CIC national chair Brian Morris says, "Nothing is inevitable – with the possible exception of the failure of the Oslo agreement if the Palestinian leadership believes that it can achieve its goals without having to engage in meaningful negotiations with Israel."

The CIC asks Chrétien "to review" his statements "and seek a public opportunity to re-affirm that Canadian support is confined exclusively to those developments that flow from direct negotiations and which reflect agreement between parties to the conflict."

Canada's position on the Middle East "has not changed," Sophie Galarneau, a spokesperson for the Prime Minister's Office, told The CJN. "The Canadian government still feels that a Palestinian state must be resolved through negotiations, the outcome of which must be mutually agreed to. We expect both sides to engage in negotiations expeditiously and in a serious fashion."

Arafat, on his first visit to Canada, was on an eight-nation tour, partly to drum up support for a unilateral declaration of independence, which he has threatened to proclaim on May 4, when the five-year transitional period under the Oslo accords expires.

"We are discussing this," a visibly tired Arafat told reporters. "We are conducting our consultations before taking a decision."

Jewish groups hold talks with Axworthy

Chrétien stressed that the Palestinian leader did not indicate he would proclaim sovereignty on May 4. The prime minister said the two discussed the May 4 timetable and "expressed the point of view that because [of the May 17] Israeli elections, it would be well-advised to consider postponing the declaration intentions to a later date."

Canadian officials went to great lengths to describe Arafat's trip as a working, and not a state, visit.

In a statement, Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) president Moshe Ronen emphasized "that this [was] not a state visit and Canada should not treat it as such…Certainly we expect Canada to discourage Mr. Arafat from any unilateral declaration of independence.

"This would destabilize the region and damage severely the prospects for a comprehensive peace."

Arafat also held talks with Foreign Affairs Minister Lloyd Axworthy, International Trade Minister Sergio Marchi and Minister for International Cooperation Diane Marleau.

The Palestinian leader paid tribute to the late Yitzhak Rabin who "paid with his life for the peace agreement," and to Shimon Peres, his "partner in peace."

The day before Arafat's visit, 20 leaders from several Canadian Jewish community organizations held another in a series of talks with Axworthy.

The 90-minute session focused in part on Arafat's threat to declare sovereignty, and on continuing human rights violations in the Palestinian-controlled areas, Ritter said.

The Jewish community also presented Axworthy with several concerns, among them:

• The Palestinians must adhere to the direct dispute mechanism contained in the Oslo accords instead of moving their grievances to the United Nations.

• Canada was taken to task for supporting last month's UN Security Council vote to hold an emergency meeting on the applicability of the Geneva Conventions to areas conquered by Israel after the 1967 war. Canada is being asked not to attend such a meeting, Ritter said, and no longer to vote for "unfair, one-sided [UN] resolutions."

• The Jewish community is still waiting for an audit of Canada's UN voting record promised much earlier by Axworthy. The minister also pledged to respond to a letter from the CIC asking the government to explain and elaborate on six principles of its Mideast policy.

Ritter said the group "didn't leave feeling very positive. There was really no headway on the UN issue."

The minister also promised to meet community groups again in six months.

Jewish organizations represented at the meeting included the CIC, Canadian Jewish Congress, Hadassah-WIZO, the Ottawa Jewish Community Council and B'nai Brith Canada.

Terry Fox Walk/Run heads to Israel

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — National Defence Minister Art Eggleton is scheduled to join the over 2,000 runners, walkers, bikers and casual strollers who are expected to take part in the first mass Terry Fox Run/Walk in Tel Aviv on April 9.

It's the first time Canadian expatriates and the Israeli public have been invited to take part in the run, held in memory of Terry Fox. In the past, Canadian soldiers stationed with United Nations peacekeepers in the Golan Heights held their own Terry Fox run. Last year, they raised $1,000 for cancer research.

Organizers have already sold 2,300 tickets, Natalie Amar, a spokesperson for the Canadian embassy in Tel Aviv, told The CJN.

Eggleton, who will be in the region to mark the 25th anniversary of UN peacekeeping between Syria and Israel, is slated to kick off the run along with Tel Aviv Mayor Ron Huldai.

The event will take place through a seven-kilometre route through Park Hayarkon in Tel Aviv. April 9 is a school holiday, and hundreds of children are expected to take part.

Amar said several large companies in Israel, including El Al and the Israel Electric Co., have committed to help send participants.

The embassy also worked closely with the Association of Americans and Canadians in Israel (AAC) and with the Canadian Tourism Commission, which is helping to set up 13 stations along the route to represent the 13 Canadian provinces and territories.

Amar said the embassy reached out to Canadians but placed equal effort in bringing in Israeli groups.

Canadians studying at Israeli universities will also take part. Air Canada has donated a free ticket to Canada as the main prize in a raffle.

A local supermarket, Greenberg, which sells President's Choice products, bought 1,000 tickets to distribute to its employees.

Clowns, jugglers and magicians will help make the day fun, Amar added.

She said the route can accommodate runners, walkers, bicycles, wheelchairs and baby strollers. Participants may also take a shorter, 3.5 kilometre route.

Last year, 58 countries organized a Terry Fox event and raised over $15 million for cancer research. This will be the first time Israel will join on a large scale. Funds raised will be channeled through the Israel Cancer Association.

Terry Fox was diagnosed with bone cancer in 1977. At age 18, his leg was amputated above the knee. He began his cross-Canada Marathon of Hope in April, 1980, and in 143 days, ran more than 4,000 kilometres – almost half of Canada.

He was forced to stop by his cancer, which had spread to his lungs. Fox died a month short of his 23rd birthday.

Anyone wanting more information on the event in Tel Aviv may dial (03) 636-3322 or by e-mail at taviv@taviv01.x400.gc.ca

Correction

In the article, "Geriatric social worker explores richness of aging," (March 25) the photograph caption should have said that the quilt was created by Irene Borins, who donated it to the Princess Margaret Hospital a few years ago. The CJN regrets the error.

Scene in Ottawa

By G.K. SIMCOE

Ezra Levant, the brash spark-plug who joined the office of the Leader of the Opposition (OLO) as coordinator of the Reform party's question period tactics squad is off to greener pastures.

When Parliament breaks for the summer, Levant is slated to join the National Post's editorial team.

The move, which will become official in a week or so, is seen as a blow to the OLO's ability to put and keep the government in the 'hot seat'. There's no doubt that Levant is both charming and bright. And, there's no doubt that he has been a definite asset to Preston Manning, despite some less than discreet attempts by some of his colleagues to push Levant towards the margins of the OLO.

His departure, however, does raise the question of just how effective the Opposition has been during question period.

Two recent cases involving defence related subjects highlight the problem.

The government has attached considerable importance and prestige to its leadership of the campaign to ban anti-personnel land mines.

Canadian interest in this issue is generally linked to Lloyd Axworthy's personal convictions regarding all things military. In fact, the land mine crusade is really just the first step in a larger effort by the foreign minister to address a wide range of human security issues.

So when certain Department of National Defence documents surfaced, indicating that senior officials in the department were and continue to be opposed to the ban on land mines, why was the story never pursued by the Opposition?

The second matter is a story that broke concerning possible job losses in the defence industry because the United States might remove the preferential status given to Canadian companies.

The Americans are furious that restricted military technology is finding its way to places like Iran, Iraq and China as a result of indifferent Canadian export controls.

Axworthy is the cabinet minister responsible for issuing export and end-user certificates for military hardware. So why, despite repeated warnings from the Pentagon, has Foreign Affairs still not brought the problem under control?

These questions could have served as mighty potent cannon fodder for an Opposition intent on discrediting the government during question period.

The Somalia inquiry aside (which was always about politics and not the military), perhaps the real question is why the Reform party is steering clear of any national defence issues.

Chassidim denounce Israel at Montreal protest

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Chassidic protesters, angrily describing the State of Israel as illegitimate, recently marched through downtown Montreal to Dorchester Square across from the Israeli consulate, to decry the four-month incarceration of three of their brethren in Jerusalem.

"Israel! Why are you oppressing the Jewish people?" and "Stop persecuting Orthodox Jewry," were two of the dozens of multicolored placards – mostly in English but also in French – wielded by the estimated 500 Chassidim at the protest.

The protesters, garbed in traditional black, included members of virtually all the chassidic groups based in Outremont, including Satmar, Belz, Tasch and Skver.

"This is against the Israeli government," protester Yitzhak Stern told The CJN. "They hate haredim. They give us tzuris."

The rally was a protest against the continued jailing without charges in Israel of haredi Jews Yaakov Korenblit, Eliezer Anshim and Yehoshua Weis.

The trio was arrested by police during a demonstration in an Orthodox Jerusalem neighborhood outside an apartment being used by Christian missionaries.

After gathering at the corner of Bleury and Sherbrooke streets, the Montreal protesters, escorted by MUC police, impeded rush-hour traffic as they marched west down Sherbrooke to Peel Street, and then turned left towards the site facing the consulate.

They handed out hundreds of copies of a "press release," printed in English and French, explaining their grievances.

The lengthy release, issued by a group called the Central Rabbinical Congress of the U.S.A. and Canada, condemned the continued incarceration of the three without charges, and referred to "all forms of Zionism [as] inherently antithetical to the teaching of our faith."

At Dorchester Square, mostly in Yiddish, speaker after speaker denounced Israel's treatment of the three prisoners, mocked its "pretensions" to democracy and condemned Zionism.

Three pick-up trucks used in the march and parked at the square carried dummies dressed in prison stripes. Other protesters shouted into megaphones: "Israeli government!" as the crowd responded with robust boos.

Family Matters

John Syrtash, B.A. (Hon.), LL.B.

The obligations of stepparents

Under Canadian law, a stepparent may have a legal obligation to share in the costs of raising a child. This obligation could exist even if he never adopts the child or never marries the child's mother, but only lives with her. (For convenience I refer to the stepparent as the male and the child's natural parent as the mother since that is the most common scenario. The law, of course, is gender-blind).

But what happens when such a stepparent separates from the child's mother? Traditionally, if both the child and the stepparent have mutually severed their psychological ties, then the stepparent may not be obliged to contribute to child support.

However, can a stepparent avoid having to pay child support by unilaterally withdrawing from his psychological relationship with a child after he separates from the child's mother? The Manitoba Court of Appeal has said yes, and so have many other Courts across the country. Other Courts have strongly disagreed.

In loco parentis

Recently, in the case of Chartier, [1998] S.C.J. No. 79, the Supreme Court of Canada appears to have cleared up the confusion by definitively ruling that a stepparent cannot withdraw unilaterally. In Chartier, the stepparent played an active role in caring for his wife's daughter from a previous relationship, and became a father figure to the girl. The parties discussed, but did not proceed with, the husband's adoption of the child. They also amended her birth registration to indicate, falsely, that the husband was the child's natural father and changed her surname to his. Sometime after the parties separated, the husband resisted a claim that he stood "in place of a parent" (in loco parentis) and argued that he should be able to unilaterally withdraw from such a role without paying any child support.

However, the Supreme Court ruled that a person cannot unilaterally withdraw from a relationship in which he stands in the place of a parent.

> "The Court must look to the nature of the relationship to determine if a person in fact does stand in the place of a parent to a child. The policies and values reflected in the Divorce Act must relate to contemporary Canadian society. They must be given a meaning that is both independent of the common law concept of in loco parentis (which was developed in various contexts during the 19th century) and reflective of the purposive and contextual approach to statutory interpretation advocated by this Court."

The Court also ruled that whether a person is in fact a "stepparent" liable for child support depends on the facts of each case. The existence of a common law or cohabitation relationship does not automatically mean that child support will become a legal obligation in the event of separation. Rather, the Court ruled that many factors must be taken into account:

> "...the test for whether or not a person stands in the place of a parent should be not be determined exclusively from the perspective of the child. [The child's opinion] ... is important, but [is] only one of many factors to be considered. The Court must determine the nature of whether the child participates in the extended family in the same way as would a biological child; whether the person provides financially for the child (depending on ability to pay); whether the person disciplines the child as a parent; whether the person represents to the child, the family, the world, either explicitly or implicitly, that he or she is responsible as a parent to the child; and, the nature or existence of the child's relationship with the absent biological parent."

Stepchild support obligations

In short, if you're contemplating cohabiting with another person who has a child or children from a former relationship, understand that you may have to pay child support if the relationship fails to last. And any prenuptial or cohabitation agreement that pretends to limit one's liability for child support in such cases is just as useless as one that pretends to do so where the parent is "real" and biological. Such clauses in agreements were popular in the past but they have now become very weak in the shadow of this new ruling: "Once it is shown that the child is to be considered, in fact, a child of the marriage, the obligations of the stepparent towards him or her are the same as those relative to a child born of the marriage with regard to the application of the Divorce Act." As most lawyers will tell you, any premarital agreement that attempts to limit child support is legally questionable.

Finally, the Court does confirm that the stepparent gains rights as a result of its ruling. This is not a "one way street": In addition to incurring obligations, the stepparent also acquires certain rights, such as the right to apply eventually for custody or access.

'Human security' focus of foreign policy: Axworthy

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Canada is not in a position to apply economic sanctions against Sudan, but there is still a possibility of stopping the war, according to Foreign Affairs Minister Lloyd Axworthy.

Speaking at a recent roundtable on religious persecution held at the Lester B. Pearson building, Axworthy outlined Canada's position, and described efforts to alleviate suffering in Sudan as well as in other war-torn countries around the world.

"Protecting and advancing freedom of religion is an intrinsic part of Canada's human security agency, and in our changing global context, this is more urgent rather than less urgent," said Axworthy.

"Canada has been reshaping its foreign policy to reflect the increasing human dimension of global peace and security. Many of the challenges we face as a global community, from violent conflict to newer threats – illicit drugs, terrorism or environmental degradation – have a more direct impact on the daily lives of ordinary people."

"Human security is providing both the focus and the impetus for global action. As a result, Canada has been taking a more human-centred approach to global relations in the initiatives we take, the themes we pursue and the methods we use."

The Department of Foreign Affairs and International Trade, he said, is prepared to devote resources to exploring ways in which "information technology as well as improved networking, better reporting and enhanced information gathering, can all be developed and used more specifically as instruments to promote religious freedom."

The roundtable, attended by academics, government officials and representatives of a wide variety of religious groups, was organized by the religious and interreligious affairs committee of Canadian Jewish Congress, with support from the Canadian Centre for Foreign Policy Development, the Department of Foreign Affairs.

"A tremendous turnout from so many different communities, all under one umbrella, was in itself an eye-opener for many people," said Rabbi Reuven Bulka, chair of the committee and of the roundtable.

There were representatives of religious groups who said they had previously felt isolated, and were unaware that other groups were dealing with similar concerns.

According to Ron Singer, conference coordinator, many participants thanked Congress for providing an opportunity to meet and work with each other. "It was a great step in building a coalition," said Singer.

Paul Marshall, senior fellow at the Centre for Religious Freedom, Freedom House, Washington, D.C., discussed Canadian Policy Alternatives for Promoting Religious Freedom.

Lloyd Axworthy

Panelists who led a discussion on Case Studies in Religious Persecution were Susanne Tamas, speaking on the Baha'i in Iran; Ronald Schwartz, on Buddhists in Tibet; and Mel Middleton, on Christians in Sudan.

As a result of the meeting, a report will be submitted to the government.

Reluctant to call the roundtable a success until its results are known, Rabbi Bulka said, "We don't delude ourselves into thinking that the problems will be solved overnight. We know what happens when people stand by idly."

He is, however, optimistic that "we could have a very powerful voice in trying to get rid of the scourge that is affecting the entire world."

Hamilton UJA campaign faces funding shortfall

By WENDY SCHNEIDER
Special to The CJN

HAMILTON — For the first time in recent memory, the 1999 UJA campaign is in danger of not being able to meet its commitment to its member agencies.

Jewish Social Services, the Kosher Food Bank, the community's three Jewish schools, the Hamilton Jewish News, and the JCC, are just some of the services whose budgets will be cut as a result.

The campaign is facing a shortfall of $150,000 due to circumstances that have prevented a number of top donors from meeting their pledges.

The board of the Jewish Federation is now faced with the question of how to maintain community services at the current level.

Hamilton's situation, according to Shelley Maerov, associate executive director of UIA/Federations Canada, is not dissimilar to that of other small federated communities across Canada, that have few donors in the top gifts category.

When these donors are not able to meet their commitment for one reason or another, it has a huge effect, she said.

Despite the challenges facing the present campaign, Maerov says that based on its community size and demographics, Hamilton is right on the line. It is actually one of the few communities that does not fall under the 80-20 rule, which says that 80 percent of the campaign comes from 20 percent of the community.

On the contrary, he said, Hamilton has a broad card support base, strong at the lower and mid-level, which has grown significantly over the last two years. This year, the campaign has continued to bring on many new gifts in this range.

The doctors' division reported that 45 percent of the community's doctors have increased their pledges over last year.

Maerov notes that Hamilton is a community that has its financial house in order, has provided well for services on a local level, and has maintained a significant number of devoted canvassers and strong leadership.

Based on Hamilton's size and demographics, Maerov believes that the community could easily generate $950,000. The current crisis is an opportunity, he believes, for donors in higher categories to raise the "glass ceiling."

Maerov admits that the UJA campaign is always vulnerable to competition from other campaigns. But unlike other campaigns, the services and infrastructure funded by the Hamilton UJA campaign are solely dependent on 1,400 local donors.

The UJA is tzedakah, not philanthropy, says Maerov. "Philanthropy enriches life while tzedakah is basic social justice. The whole essence of our campaign is caring for Jews. If we don't address these needs, who will?"

The 1999 UJA cabinet, headed by Cele Steinberg, Allen Rams, Sandy Morris and Vivienne Epstein, is now asking each member of the community to consider an additional gift of at least 10 percent this year

Yiddish conference plans for future

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Among the suggestions presented at the Winnipeg Committee for Yiddish annual conference, held recently at the Na'amat Hall in north Winnipeg, were a summer seminar and a chair in Yiddish at the local universities.

"We decided that this year, instead of passing resolutions, we would entertain suggestions and try to follow through on them," says Osher (Oscar) Antel, the Yiddish committee chair.

Mark Steiner, president of the Jewish Public Library said that there is a revival of Yiddish at universities in other cities.

Roz Usiskin, president of the Jewish Heritage Centre of Western Canada, called on the committee to plan a program to tie in with the coming celebrations to commemorate 1,000 years of Yiddish.

The conference attracted about 50 people including representatives from the Winnipeg Jewish Community Council, the United Jewish Peoples Order and the Yiddish-speaking H. Leivick B'nai Brith Lodge.

Edith Kimelman, a conference participant, said that considering the size of Winnipeg's Jewish population, there is a still a good-sized percentage of Yiddish-speakers here.

אז מה עושים בכל זאת? על זה דיווח במדור הבא.

בסיאטל הורשעה מורה בת שלושים וחמש באונס של תלמיד בן 13, ממנו נכנסה להריון. היא שוחררה מבית הסוהר וחזרה להיפגש עם התלמיד, הרתה שוב ונכנסה שוב לבית סוהר, הפעם לתקופה ארוכה. על פניו - מקרה ברור של התנהגות בלתי הולמת, מנוגדת לחוק. עכשיו, בואו ניכנס קצת יותר לעומק הסיפור: הנער, שמוצאו באיים של האוקיינוס השקט, מפותח מכפי גילו, חבר בכנופיית עבריינים צעירים. טרם שקיים יחסי מין עם מורתו - הוא קיים יחסים עם נשים רבות מאז היותו בן אחת עשרה, כולל נשים מבוגרות, אף אחת מהן לא הואשמה באינוס קטין. הוא התערב על עשרים דולאר עם בן דודו, שלומד איתו באותה כיתה, שיצליח לפתות את המורה האטרקטיבית. האישה עצמה מורה מצטיינת, מאוד מסורה לעבודתה, אם לארבעה ילדים, עם בעיות קשות בנישואין. היא טענה שהנער הפעיל עליה לחץ קשה לפתות אותה, עד שעלה בידו, אחרי כשנה של נסיונות.
אז מי אנס את מי? האם לא היה נכון יותר לבדוק מקרה כזה, או כל מקרה אחר, בהקשר שלו עצמו? איך אפשר לאמר שהיא אנסה את הנער אם הוא עתיר נסיון בפיתוי נשים מבוגרות, בעוד שהיא, עד למקרה הזה, לא עסקה בפעילויות כאלה. ומדוע בית סוהר? הרי ברגע שהפסידה את מקצוע ההוראה שהיה כה אהוב עליה - חרב עולמה ממילא. היא גם הפסידה את משפחתה וארבעת ילדיה. מעבר למקרה והרכילות העסיסית שבו, הוא מעלה את הדילמה של גיל ההתבגרות. למשל, אלפי נערות צעירות בנות חמש עשרה עושות הכל כדי להיראות בנות עשרים, כולל פעילות מינית. האם כל גבר בן עשרים ושתים שנפגש איתן חייב לבקש תעודת זהות לפני קיום יחסי מין? אין ספק שהחוק חייב להגן על אנשים צעירים, אבל החוק חייב להיות הגיוני. המקרה של סיאטל מדגים, לדעתי, מידה רבה של אטימות, צביעות ורשעות. מסתבר שהשריף המקומי, שהלך לבחירות בדיוק באותו זמן, הפך את המקרה לדגל השמרני שלו, על חשבונה של משפחה שלמה. אבל שישאר בינינו.

'A cause for committed action'

By RABBI DOW MARMUR

Jews come to synagogue mainly for public events. Much personal worship takes place in the private sphere, notably the home.

It's in the home that the most significant events in the Jewish calendar are celebrated; it's there that the most important rituals are performed. It's in the home that a better future is anticipated by celebrating the Sabbath as a foretaste of messianic times. The home is every Jew's small sanctuary.

The scandal of homelessness

Placing a blanket on a woman lying on the Danforth in Toronto.

Much of what – perhaps romantically and, nowadays, less than accurately – is described as the closeness of the Jewish family, has its roots in this understanding of home. It's not a matter of sociology but of theology; of holiness.

The home isn't an institution for Jews only. Though Judaism imposes certain practices on its adherents, its quest for a better future always has all humanity in mind.

In recognizing the importance of the Jewish home, Judaism also recognizes the importance of the home for all God's creatures, all humanity. Hence the affirmation that we must resist all forces that, in one way or another, deprive humans of sacred space, of the home that must also be a sanctuary.

Miriam Kalushner finds a homeless man nestled in the alcove of a church downtown. Although many homeless people have nothing except what they carry with them, they will rarely accept more than they need and are very grateful of what they receive.

Hence also, the stress on hospitality, the imperative to welcome all who are in need of home. Jewish tradition has it that the biblical Abraham kept his tent open on all sides to encourage wayfarers to stop by. That's how he was found by the angels who, disguised as homeless visitors, assured him of progeny with Sarah.

Ironically, in their desire to shed their religious heritage, some of the Jewish pioneers who built Israel wanted to do away with the conventional home. Hence the kibbutz with its emphasis on collective living and communal eating – and no reference to Jewish tradition. The failure of the kibbutz, now so apparent, may have something to do with socialist perestroika, but it's primarily the result of the refusal to build small sanctuaries in favor of large dining halls.

The reincarnation of the kibbutz as a middle class enterprise came about when its members decided to come home and abandon the dining hall to live like their forbears, even bringing back some of the once discarded home rituals that make for holiness.

Knowing what home can be, I also know what homelessness leads to. I'm shattered by the scandal of homelessness in this society that professes humility before God, a desire to bring dignity to all and to promote family values.

When Jews speak of the scandal of homelessness, it's not a theoretical construct, but the result of bitter experience. From the time our biblical ancestors wandered in the wilderness between Egypt and the Promised Land until now, we have known what it means to be without a home.

As the psalmist lamented after the Babylonian exile: "By the rivers of Babylon, there we sat, sat and wept as we thought of Zion." Zion is the metaphor of home for the people of Israel. Jewish history is suffused with the tears of the homeless.

For much of my early years, I knew no home in the accepted sense of the word, only collective living, tossed by the vagaries of war from country to country, from place to place, from one river to the next, from one bunk to another. I know how profane it is not to have one's own space. I think of it every time I see homeless people take the mattress that Toronto's Out of the Cold program provides them, to allow them to spend the night on the floor with 40 other homeless persons.

When the temperature drops, hot soup is a comfort that many people on the streets look forward to.

[Stephen Epstein photos]

In this society, there's no reason why people should live like that. Yes, the problems are complex, and a few individuals may choose to live on the streets, but those who come for a meal and a mattress every Thursday night in winter to the synagogue I serve, have not chosen their lot. We cannot house them in the way they deserve to be housed. Only governments – local, provincial, federal – can do that.

Homelessness therefore, should not be an object for detached study, but a cause for committed action. We know the problem, but we are not sure about the will to solve it.

In this country, at this time in its history, homelessness is totally preventable. The fact that it exists suggests several things. For those in power, the plight of the homeless can be ignored, because being so totally powerless, they are of no political consequence. As a society, we only pay lip service to compassion while our real commitment is to "the bottom line," and finally, that when we make ourselves out to be champions of the family and its values, it's only certain kinds of families we have in mind, namely, those who are like ourselves.

I hope a call will go out to the powers that be to solve homelessness, not to stay fixated on reducing the national debt, or putting more money in the pockets of those who don't need it.

Ve'ahavta hits the road to provide Street Help for days. He's worried.

At Yonge and Eglinton, Ken recognizes someone. We all pile out of the van with enthusiasm (which, we later reflect, might seem a bit intimidating to a homeless person), ladle the hot vegetable soup into a foam bowl, and offer a sandwich. The shy young man accepts, says thank you, and moves on.

The scandal of homelessness

At Queen and Sherbourne, we encounter our first and only drunk, a toothless older man who, although quite tipsy, is utterly charming. "I'll never forget God," he proudly tells Rabbi Gottlieb, after accepting some soup and a sandwich.

So far, so good. A group of young squatters politely accept food and loose tobacco, each one muttering, "Thanks, man." A man and a woman with a Pekinese puppy can't thank us enough. "God bless you all," they say. "We'd be dead without you." The woman hugs each of us tightly, and wipes away a tear.

At the Ossington subway station, are two men, one young. The older man's hands are so gnarled, he can't grip the cigarettes we rolled for him. "I'm freezing my arse off," he says, his voice trembling. Both receive sleeping bags.

A disturbing scene unfolds under the bridge where Bloor Street becomes the Danforth. Several straggly young people emerge from a tent with trays they pile high with everything we offer. Among them is a girl not older than 17. She's three months pregnant.

Five men who live in the washroom of a public park even manage some humor; their leader, who sports an awesome bushy beard, engages us in some television trivia. One of two men we wake up from a deep sleep on a subway grate near Queen's Park just says, "No, thanks," and rolls over.

"There's a lot of personality out there," observes Rosensweig.

And so it goes, with not one bad experience. No one has yelled at us. No one has threatened us. Everyone has been courteous to a fault, and even dignified. Rosensweig and Rabbi Gottlieb both wear kippot; there's been not one sidelong glance or anything that can be interpreted as anti-Semitic. Some are shy about asking for a second sandwich. Just one person refuses any help.

And it turns out that Ken, who drives the van three nights a week, is a veritable Sherpa of the streets, knowing every nook, cranny, alleyway and park frequented by the homeless. He eases the wide van down narrow laneways and paths, and navigates ravine embankments with ease. Cherry Beach at midnight looks the end of the Earth; frightening looking residents in a garbage-strewn swath under the Gardner Expressway resemble characters from one of those post-nuclear holocaust movies. Toronto at night looks very different from this vantage point.

I thought I'd be out for an hour or two. Seven hours later, I head home, exhausted but fulfilled, and wondering how seemingly normal people wind up being spat out by society. For a night at least, in our little corner of the little blue speck, we've made the world a bit better.

Scott Staiman hands a man some soup and a cup of coffee. The van carries juice, candy, cookies, condoms and tobacco.

Alison Epstein and Miriam Kalushner serve up hot soup and sandwiches from the back of the van. A hearty turkey and rice soup and peanut butter and jam sandwiches are tonight's offering.

Miriam Kalushner gives a man at Queen Street West soup and sandwiches. Often, recipients feel that they would like to give something back whether it be a newspaper, poem or just a smile.

The scandal of homelessness

An eighty seven year old man tries to find a safe place to sleep undisturbed. His regular grate had been taken over by a younger homeless man. One of the biggest challenges of living on the street is securing and maintaining a place to bed down. Some people turn to the heated foyers of automatic banking machines until bank security guards tell them to leave.

In a doorway not far from the Art Gallery of Ontario, a young man finds some shelter from the biting wind. He declined the offering of food but instead asked Alison Epstein for a warm sleeping bag. Sleeping bags are supplied by Project Warmth and the Aboriginal Peacekeeping Unit of the Metropolitan Toronto Police.

Natalie Lichtenstein and Karri Ritchie spend the afternoon preparing the hundreds of sandwiches needed. The food is ready by 7:30 PM at which time the van is loaded. The volunteers are on the streets till 3:30 AM unless the supplies run out earlier.

Netanyahu blasts EU declaration on final status

Europeans support Palestinian statehood

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu told a group of young European parliamentarians, here last weekend as guests of the Likud, that Europe "fails to understand the difference between two types of peace: peace between democracies, and peace between democracies and non-democracies."

He repeated his remarks that "in light of the fact that a third of the Jewish people died in Europe," the European Union (EU) should not "dictate a solution that would endanger the existence of the people of Israel."

He was speaking about the declaration approved by EU leaders at their Berlin summit last week, calling for negotiations on the final status of the Palestinian territories to be concluded within a year, and referring to Jerusalem as a corpus separatum, a separate legal entity.

The United States believes the resolution should be regarded positively, since the EU did not endorse a French proposal that European diplomatic recognition be automatically conferred on the Palestinians at the end of the 12-month period, even if there is no progress in the talks.

A senior Palestinian Authority official declared that he was "optimistic and delighted" at the EU declaration of support for a Palestinian state. But Minister of Planning and International Cooperation, Nabil Shaath, would only say that the declaration "will be a very important factor when we come to discuss the question."

The statement voiced support for a Palestinian "sovereign" state, and declared "its readiness to consider the recognition of a Palestinian state in due course."

The EU's special envoy to the Middle East, Miguel Moratinos, called the declaration "balanced." He said it was intended "to facilitate a decision by the PA on the question of when to declare an independent Palestinian state."

Moratinos and Shaath were at a symposium held at the French National Assembly. Moratinos said he was "sorry" to hear about Netanyahu's attack on the declaration. Moratinos said he believed the EU leaders had found the "precise formulation" that can "sever the connection between the need to conduct negotiations on the Palestinians' declaration of independence, and the necessity of implementing mutual commitments" by the two sides.

He said the 12-month target date postulated by the EU for completion of the final-status talks "will give the new Israeli government that will be formed after the elections, time to deal with the difficult issues that await handling: water, refugees, the fate of the settlements and the status of Jerusalem."

Palestinian negotiator, Saeb Erekat, was quoted in the East Jerusalem daily Al Ayam as saying that the EU declaration represented "progress," but the EU and the Palestinians were still at odds over a deadline. "Twelve months is a long time," he said.

190 Jews evacuate Yugoslavia

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — As a result of the NATO strikes in Kosovo and Yugoslavia, some Jews have chosen to leave the war-torn areas.

About 190 Jews from Belgrade, Novi Sad and other towns in Yugoslavia have made their way to Budapest, where they are being cared for by the Budapest Jewish community, according to the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (JDC).

They are being housed temporarily in a boarding school and a Jewish community centre, while plans to move them to a Budapest hotel are being considered.

Jews remaining in Belgrade – where the Jewish community numbers roughly 1,200 – reported last weekend that life was continuing as usual, except for longer bread lines, a JDC official said.

But Jews in Kosovo have declined offers to help them leave, according to Jewish aid workers who have been active in the former Yugoslavia.

Plans have reportedly been drawn up to extract the approximately 60 Jews remaining in the Kosovar capital of Pristina if necessary, the workers said.

Meanwhile, eight Jewish men from the former Yugoslav republic of Macedonia fled to Bulgaria over the weekend and were being cared for by local Jews near the Bulgarian capital of Sofia.

The men, all of them college students, expressed fears that the conflict might spill over the Serbian-Macedonian border.

Israeli groups launch conversion institute

By AVI MACHLIS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Representatives of Reform, Conservative and Orthodox Judaism have launched the country's first inter-denominational conversion institute in the northern Galilee town of Carmiel.

But this latest development in the ongoing battle over religious pluralism in the Jewish state began under a cloud of charges and uncertainty, raising questions about how successful the institute will be in resolving the debate that has divided many Jews.

Leaders of the liberal streams said the institute – originally devised as a compromise to end a two-year controversy over whether conversions they perform in Israel should be recognized by the state – did not solve any problems because the Orthodox Chief Rabbinate has not officially agreed to recognize the institute's graduates.

The Institute for Judaic Studies, founded by the Jewish Agency for Israel and the Israeli government, started its first program last week with 37 students, all emigrants from the former Soviet Union.

Many of the immigrants are non-Jews married to Jews, who had been eligible to immigrate under the Law of Return, which grants automatic citizenship to all Jews when they move to Israel.

They will study Judaism for 440 hours – three times a week during a one-year period – supervised by a staff of about 25 teachers, who are drawn from the three main streams of Judaism.

"Teachers will deliver courses based on their expertise," said Tsila Kraskin, executive coordinator of the institute for the Jewish Agency. "Panel discussions will include members of all streams."

According to Kraskin, while Israel's chief rabbis have not explicitly endorsed the institute, they hinted at a recent meeting that Orthodox rabbinical courts would consider graduates of the new institute eligible for conversions.

"The chief rabbis told us that they don't convert institutes, they convert people," said Kraskin. "They said if the institute's graduates will meet their criteria, they will have no problem."

A spokesperson for the Chief Rabbinate, Tzvi Rosen, confirmed that this is the chief rabbis' position.

"They will be tested according to the Halachah," he said of the candidates for conversion. "It doesn't matter whether they come from this or that institute."

But Rabbi Uri Regev, director of the Reform movement's Religious Action Centre in Israel, called the statement a bluff.

He said several Reform and Conservative conversion candidates were recently sent to a moderate Orthodox rabbi to complete their conversion courses.

But even this rabbi only agreed to carry out the conversion if the candidates agreed to observe Shabbat, keep kosher and give their children an Orthodox education, he said.

"They were left with two options," said Regev. "Either to lie – and some did – to get an Orthodox conversion, or, for those who were not willing to lie, to accept that they cannot convert."

This, said Regev, is probably the meaning of the rabbinate's willingness to consider the institute's graduates.

"Their statement only proves that the institute is totally irrelevant to them," said Regev.

In addition, he said, the institute's launch does not change the fact that the Ne'eman Committee has failed.

The committee, headed by former Finance Minister Ya'acov Ne'eman, was created two years ago by the government to seek a compromise to the conversion issue.

"Ne'eman sold us peace in the Jewish people, and this means there was supposed to be give and take," he said. "In reality, there is no dialogue, no cooperation, no recognition."

It was the Ne'eman Committee that proposed the inter-denominational institute as a compromise solution to the conversion issue.

The three major streams of Judaism would be involved in preparing candidates for conversion, while only Orthodox rabbis would be allowed to perform the conversions.

The compromise was suggested to head off a crisis sparked when Orthodox parties in the Knesset tried to pass a conversion bill that would have codified into law the Orthodox Chief Rabbinate's authority over all conversions conducted in Israel.

Orthodox parties blamed the liberal movements for the crisis, saying they were trying to break the decades-old status quo by seeking court rulings favorable to their cause.

Responding to the concerns, Prof. Binyamin Ish-Shalom, the institute's Orthodox chair, urged all sides to give the institute a chance.

"I think we need to give it time, and ultimately, the test will be in the field, when our graduates will stand before the rabbinical courts," he said.

• Former Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Shamir resigned from the governing Likud party, which he helped found. Shamir, who has accused Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu of betraying the ideology of Likud's founders, told Associated Press he has joined the Herut party, led by Ze'ev Benny Begin, another Likud defector.

• Arab Knesset member, Azmi Bashara, announced he is running for prime minister. Bashara explained his decision by saying he wanted to ensure Arab affairs were given the attention they deserved.

• Taken aback by the Likud election campaign's failure to generate any excitement, Netanyahu urgently recalled his American media advisor, Arthur Finkelstein.

The weak campaign has disrupted the timetable originally envisaged by the campaign committee. The Likud is the only major party that has not yet held a gala opening for its campaign. Observers in the Likud said this was due to a budget shortfall, but informed sources said the real reason was that the party has not yet worked out its "information campaign."

• An invitation to Yitzhak Mordechai to attend a memorial ceremony for the late Yitzhak Rabin in Washington two weeks ago, spurred angry accusations from both Likud and Labor party officials that the United States is too involved in the Israeli election campaign.

FIRST CALL

This year, on the eve of the Holocaust Martyrs and Heroes Remembrance Day, Yad Vashem will launch a broad-based comprehensive campaign to collect the names of Holocaust victims.

For over 43 years, Yad Vashem has been collecting testimonies of survivors in Israel and throughout the world. Survivors' testimonies are a foremost source of information in the documentation of the names of those who perished in the Holocaust. These testimonies are sometimes the only perpetuation of the victims' names. Relatives and loved ones complete pages of testimony with the victims' personal details, including last place of residence, profession, place and circumstances of their death. Occasionally, a picture of the victim is attached to the form. The pages of testimony are preserved in the Hall of Names at Yad Vashem.

Until now, 53 years after the end of World War II, some three million names of Holocaust victims have been collected in the Hall of Names at Yad Vashem. As the twentieth century draws to a close and the generation of survivors grows older, this may be the last opportunity for the Jewish people in Israel and the Diaspora to provide a name and memory for each of the six million people who were murdered simply because they were Jews. A census of the Jewish people will be initiated and conducted in order to collect the still unknown names of those who perished in the Holocaust.

Yad Vashem will again appeal, in Israel and in the Diaspora, to the relatives and loved ones of those who were murdered in the Holocaust, to complete pages of testimony. At a later stage, the pages of testimony will be scanned and entered into the international central data base of victims' names in the Hall of Names at Yad Vashem.

At the launching of the campaign at Yad Vashem, the President and the Prime Minister of the State of Israel will call upon the Jewish people to heed this appeal and fill out pages of testimony.

The Canadian Society along with the American & British Societies have been asked to be a part of this very exciting and critically important project. In Israel the Campaign will be launched on the eve of Yom Hashoah Monday, April 12, 1999, and will continue until the end of the century in Israel and among Jewish Communities worldwide.

Please take this opportunity to fill in this page of testimony and to obtain more pages or for further information contact the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem at 416-785-1333 or 1-888-494-7999 or e-mail ydvashem@istar.ca

Crafting a legacy in Morocco

By PETER EPHROSS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

CASABLANCA — On a recent sunny day outside the Jewish elementary school here, Boris Azran watched as his two oldest children joined hundreds of others celebrating Purim festivities.

After a group of younger students performed a few Hebrew songs, older students, decked out in costumes ranging from Superman to Cleopatra, strutted across the stage.

A clothes manufacturer, the 35-year-old Azran, his youngest child sitting in his lap, says he is content with the education his daughters Melissa, 10, and Jordanna, 8, are receiving at the Narcisse-Leven elementary school.

But as soon as they are older, he expects that they, like other young Moroccan Jews, will move abroad for their education – most likely to the United States. He and his wife, he says, will follow them.

The reason he expects his family to leave is simple: "There are not a lot of Jews here."

Azran's assessment is undeniably true: Morocco's Jewish community, which stood at a robust 250,000 in 1948, has dwindled to approximately 5,000 today; most of its members are older than 50.

As Moroccan Jewry becomes a remnant of what it once was, the Jews who are still there have a new goal: crafting a tribute to the 2,000 years of Jewish life in this country just south of Spain. Judging by the words of top government officials, and their participation in recent Jewish events, Morocco's leadership shares that goal.

The slow death of Morocco's Jewish community is nothing new. The exodus that began soon after Morocco gained its independence from France in 1956, and accelerated during the 1960s, has continued unabated since.

The once-flourishing communities of Fez, Rabat and Marrakesh, all of which once boasted thousands of Jews living intimately in walled medieval markets, now have only a few hundred members. Only Casablanca, which still supports more than 20 synagogues, has enough Jewish students to keep a Jewish day school system alive.

"I used to work a lot with children. Now I work a lot with older people," says the soft-spoken David Dayan, a longtime school principal at the now-closed Jewish high school in Marrakesh, who, with coaxing, shows off a card in his wallet with the photos of the Jewish basketball team he coached in the late 1940s.

Moroccan government officials boast of what they call the "2,000 years of peaceful Arab-Jewish coexistence" – and it is true that Jews have been treated better here than in many other parts of North Africa or Europe.

But the historical record is more complex. As is true elsewhere around the globe, the Jewish experience in Morocco has been cyclical, with favorable times followed by periods of anti-Semitism.

This cycle has not changed in modern times. During World War II, for example, then-King Muhammad V refused a request by the pro-Nazi Vichy France regime to round up the country's Jews for deportation.

But several years later, Moroccan Jews, like others in the Arab world, were attacked by the local population during the period surrounding the 1948 establishment of the State of Israel. But, say Jewish historians, there were no uprisings during the 1967 Six Day War, as there were in neighboring Tunisia.

In more recent times, Moroccan King Hassan II, Muhammad V's son, attempted to steer a King Hussein-like heterodox course between Israel and the Palestinians.

Indeed, after the famous 1993 handshake on the White House lawn between Yitzhak Rabin and Yasser Arafat, Israel was allowed to open up a consular office in Rabat.

Relations with Israel frozen

Hassan, upset with the policies of current Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, has frozen relations with Israel. And the number of Israeli tourists – Moroccan officials say 40,000 visited the country annually in 1995 and 1996 in the euphoria that followed the Oslo accords – has been cut at least in half.

"It is no secret that the king does not feel comfortable with the current leadership in Israel," Nabeel Khoury, the U.S. consul general in Rabat, said during a recent interview with reporters.

Despite the freeze, Israel still sells Morocco a host of agricultural products, said Gadi Golan, Israel's consul general in Morocco, who is allowed to stay in the country but is prevented from meeting officially with government ministers.

Moroccan officials say they hope that once peace is reached in the Middle East, Jews will return to this North African country, a land where just a few minutes walk takes one from city streets featuring sleek professionals dressed in Parisian black fashions to medieval marketplaces filled with labyrinthine alleyways where donkeys tread.

But when pressed, government officials speak mainly of the importance of Moroccan Jewry in the development of their country, a nostalgia for a time when Jewish and Muslim children played side by side – and of a desire for economic benefits through tourism and through increased trade with Israel.

Indeed, Moroccan officials, once unwilling to mention the State of Israel, now speak of their readiness to establish a direct Tel Aviv-Casablanca flight if peace is achieved.

"What is important is to share business, joint ventures, large cooperation together," said Andre Azoulay, a former banker and the chief economic adviser to Hassan.

Azoulay is believed to be the only Jewish minister in the Arab world.

For their part, Moroccan Jews are proud of their tradition, and at a session with American reporters on a recent trip to the country, members of Fez's Jewish community bristled when asked why they, too, hadn't joined their ex-compatriots in Israel, France, Canada or the United States.

"Why should a people deeply rooted for 2,000 years not co-exist with others in the land where he is living?" said Dr. Armand Guigui, the president of the Jewish community of Fez.

In private, however, members of Morocco's Jewish community admit that the history of Jews in Morocco will soon, for all intents and purposes, be over.

"The community of Moroccan Jews is good in France, is good in the United States, is good in Canada and is good in Israel. They have a future there," said one older Moroccan Jew, whose six children now live abroad, including two who teach at a yeshiva in the Israeli town of Bnei Brak.

In the meantime, much of what remains of Morocco's Jewish past is nostalgia – including the celebrations of holidays, when the community, in the words of Jacques Zafrani, the leader of the Jewish community of Marrakesh, used to go from house to house at the end of Passover to eat cake.

There are also physical memories. In addition to cemeteries filled with tombstones, there are synagogues – some run down and defunct, others, replete with chandeliers and cedar wood Torah arks, still holding daily minyans – and a host of Jewish artifacts that like the prayer books, kippot and wedding dresses at one museum in Fez, are scattered in disarray.

To its credit, the Moroccan Jewish community appears to be successful as it attempts to create a legacy of monuments.

It has formed the Foundation for the Preservation of Morocco's Jewish Heritage.

JTA News Editor Peter Ephross recently visited Morocco as a guest of the country's tourist ministry.

Making the right food choices at Passover

JERUSALEM — Despite the many changes in our diet during Passover, we should still make wise food choices during this eight-day holiday.

You can make it through Passover if you just stick to a few rules. Shaare Zedek's head of nutritional services, Rachel Zochovizky, offers us some useful suggestions.

Firstly, small meals are recommended during seder days. Drink plenty, but not eat after 4 p.m., until the evening meal. Since seder meals are particularly rich and heavy, this should help balance the daily calorie intake as well as help reduce the familiar post-seder feeling of being bloated.

Note: The calories keep piling up during Passover. Take it easy on the matzah! Half a regular matzah has the same amount of calories as one slice of bread; one "light" matzah equals one bread slice; and one hand-made (shmura) matzah equals a whopping three slices of bread!

Celiac sufferers (people with an intolerance to the gluten in wheat, rye, barley and oats) should remember that matzah contains flour.

The following items also equal one slice of bread: two tablespoons of matzah meal, one medium knaidel (and who eats only one?), and one cup of borscht. One medium potato latke equals one slice of bread plus one portion of fat exchange.

Diabetics and dieters should try to use dry white wine for the customary four cups of wine at the seders; dry white or red wine is recommended for all. The sweeter and heavier the wine, the more calories it contains.

Many Passover recipes call for lots of eggs; in many cases, egg whites can successfully be used instead of the yolk. Try it whenever you can.

Avoid fried foods when possible and stick to reduced fat recipes that involve baking, steaming and boiling.

Passover cakes and cookies usually contain generous amounts of coconut or crushed nuts. Eat these moderately because they contain lots of fats and sugars.

Passover is usually a time of eating, reduced activity and relaxation. As we all know when we climb on the scales, this can be a dangerous combination. During the eight days of Passover, try to eat more vegetables than usual and at least two or three fruit portions every day. Take walks and try to increase physical activity.

Matzah combined with inactivity tends to make Passover also the festival of — to put it delicately — sluggish digestion. Drink at least 10 to 12 cups of liquids daily, preferably unsweetened, to get the system moving. Water is always the best.

Passover always brings with it certain medical events directly related to the festival – a marked increase in the number of limbs broken by people falling off ladders or chairs, or slipping on wet floors while doing their Passover cleaning. In one instance, the window-ledge upon which one woman was standing while cleaning her windows suddenly collapsed. She fell, breaking two ribs, and had to be treated by orthopedic specialists.

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. I have recently seen a lot of elephant garlic in the stores. Can you tell me what it is used for, and if it is just large garlic.

A. Elephant garlic does appear to be a very large head of garlic, but in fact, it is different in many ways. Firstly, elephant garlic is a member of the leek family and therefore has a milder taste than regular garlic. This makes it a great choice for recipes such as Caesar dressing that use raw garlic.

If substituting elephant garlic for regular, one clove of elephant garlic equals approximately 10 cloves of regular garlic. I love throwing these whole, peeled cloves in the bottom of the roasting pan when I make a whole chicken. Along with turnips, onions and potatoes, garlic is sensational and mild flavored when roasted.

Q. Is there a flavor difference between white and brown mushrooms?

A. Yes. Brown mushrooms tend to be much more flavorful. Small brown mushrooms, called cremini mushrooms, are actually small portobello's. If you do not require the large size of the portobello for presentation purposes, then save a lot of money and purchase the equally flavorful cremini. Since mushrooms contain so much natural water, they can be sauteed without any added fat in a non-stick pan.

Mount Sinai to expand

TORONTO — Mount Sinai Hospital will be able to transform its emergency services to make them more responsive, state-of-the-art and patient friendly, thanks to a $5-million donation from Gerald Schwartz, president of Onex Corporation, and his wife Heather Reisman, president of Indigo Books and Music.

The new Schwartz/Reisman Emergency Centre will be 25 percent larger than the current emergency department, providing patients with quieter, less crowded surroundings, greater privacy, and easier access to nursing stations, telephone and washrooms.

The gift will also form the basis of a Fund for Excellence in Emergency Medicine. The fund will have as its goal, education and research into ways emergency care can be improved and taught to doctors and nurses to provide a better emergency experience for patients.

The centre will feature a fast-track treatment area that will reduce frustrating delays for patients who can be treated and released fairly quickly. This would include injuries such as minor broken bones, lacerations requiring stitches and dental emergencies.

The number of patient treatment areas will increase to 36 patient care spaces from the current 22. The whole design is geared toward making it easier for staff and patients to interact."

Construction for the centre is expected to begin in late spring.

Actress exhilarated by theatre work

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

Debra Kirshenbaum credits her high school drama classes for inspiring her to become an actress.

Now, Kirshenbaum has the opportunity to inspire a new generation of students with her performance in Waiting For Lewis presented by Theatre Direct Canada, a company devoted to entertaining adolescent audiences.

Born in Montreal, Kirshenbaum headed to Toronto after graduating from Montreal's Dome Theatre School in the mid-80s. "There was not much of a future in Montreal for an English actor, so I decided to move to Toronto. The great thing about Toronto, is you can have a freelance career in film, television and theatre."

Kirshenbaum arrived in Toronto as an unknown, working as a waitress and office temp to supplement her income. "I used to crash theatre auditions, because it was hard to be seen if you weren't a member of Actra or Equity, the actors' unions."

On the suggestion of other budding actors, Kirshenbaum auditioned for productions held at the University of Toronto. Although non-paying, it helped her to build up her resume. Within two years, Kirshenbaum's talents were being noticed. She hired an agent, and joined the ranks as a full-time actor.

She now boasts a large list of credits. Her movie appearances include, Searching for Bobby Fisher and the Long Kiss Goodnight, in which star Geena Davis pulls a gun on her. Kirshenbaum co-starred in the Gemini Award winning film the Battle of the Bulge.

She's also applied her craft in television, but Kirshenbaum says that the major highlights of her career occurred in the realm of theatre, in productions such as Crackwalker, White Trash, Blue Eyes, Head of Snakes, Brother Andre's Heart, Serious Comedy For Oxymorons, The Whore's Revenge and Counter Service.

"You can't fake it in the theatre, because you are out in front, making a connection with the audience. I find this satisfying and more of an artistic sense of accomplishment. It's exhausting, but more exhilarating, too. It requires a lot of chutzpah every night to go out there and give it your best. Although it is more physically demanding than television and film, it is also very rewarding.

Debra Kirshenbaum

"When working in the theatre, anything can happen, and often does. Once I was on stage in an elaborate Victorian costume, when my skirt popped off to the ground. While in the musical, Lolla Star Builds Her Dream Home, I fell off a ramp, and the cast continued to sing. With tears in my eyes, I climbed back on stage and finished the number.

"It's amazing what adrenaline will do, and how the desperate feeling of not wanting to look like a fool in front of hundreds of people, will make you overcome. You have to be grounded and on your toes to cope with every theatre mishap. I have a great respect for those who work in this business."

In Waiting For Lewis, she plays Susan, a well adjusted upper middle-class mom, who, along with her husband, moves her city loving teens to the country, much to their chagrin.

"Most things Theatre Direct does, deals with issues of adolescence, and [the company] seems to respect the intelligence of the teenagers involved. In this play, the mother of the lead character – Lewis – is an alcoholic.

"Often in theatre, when kids come from a bad home life, they are portrayed as messed up, but Lewis compensates [by] creating poignant moments when [he] parents his parent," she states.

The play, Fabrizio Filippo's first commissioned mainstage production, celebrates its' world premier at the Buddies In Bad Times Theatre, 12 Alexander Street, from April 12 to May 1. It runs Monday to Friday at 1 p.m., with additional performances on Tuesday and Thursday at 10 a.m., and Friday and Saturday at 8 p.m. Tickets are $9.50-$16.00. For more information call 975-8556, group bookings 537-4191.

Stark honesty marks film

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The way in which Poles related to Jewish suffering during the Holocaust still haunts Poland. In The Holy Week, a film by Andrzej Wajda, one of Poland's greatest directors, this controversial subject is explored at length with nuanced sensitivity.

The movie, released in 1996, receives its North American television premiere on Vision TV on April 8 at 8 p.m.

Based on Jerzy Andrzjewski's novel, The Holy Week unfolds against the backdrop of the heroic 1943 Warsaw ghetto uprising, which was mercilessly crushed by the Germans.

Irena, a Jewish woman seeking sanctuary, finds shelter with a couple in the suburbs of Warsaw. It is a somewhat embarrassing arrangement, since Jan, the man of the house, is Irena's former lover. More to the point, Jan and his pregnant wife, Anna, risk the ultimate punishment, death by execution, if the Germans ferret out Irena.

Wajda wastes no time in setting the mood. As Irena wanders through Warsaw in a daze, shots rings out, flames erupt from tenement windows and people jump out of buildings. The Jewish revolt has begun.

Having established the appropriate tone, he develops the theme by revealing what various Poles think about Irena, and by implication, about Jews.

Alhough he has taken the initiative to harbor Irena, Jan is basically ambivalent. "Does Irena look like a Jewess?" he asks Anna, an angelic-looking woman who's basically sympathetic to Irena's plight. Later, when Anna expresses empathy for Jews as a persecuted group, Jan retorts that Poles face danger, too.

Yet, Anna is not the only person with a conscience in The Holy Week. Jan's younger brother Julek, a resistance fighter, denounces fascism and anti-Semitism.

Wajda portrays Irena as tough, feisty, bitter and none too hopeful about her prospects of surviving the Nazi occupation. From Jan's roof, she watches the ghetto burning against a bleak orange sky, a sign of things to come.

The villains make themselves known in no uncertain terms.

Jan's neighbor, a blackmarketeer, claims that Irena's very presence is a threat to everyone in the building, and that Poles "should not die for Jews." Her husband, a common lout, tries to rape Irena.

The most virulent anti-Semitism is voiced by Jan's boss. "We should be grateful to Hitler," he says. "Poland doesn't want Jews." Disgusted by his tirade, a female employee stalks out of the office. Jan, however, remains basically silent, fearful of roiling the waters.

In rounding out his cast of Polish types, Wajda introduces us to Jan's landlord, a bookish old man who feels the need to eject Irena from the building but who "respects" human life.

Relentlessly somb̈re and unflinchingly realistic, The Holy Week earns the respect of a viewer with its stark honesty. And while it is not one of Wajda's great films, like Ashes and Diamonds, it stands up to scrutiny.

Eye on Arts

by Bill Gladstone

CASHING IN ON THE MILLENNIUM?

Nathan Gazzara is a bearded Jewish peddler living in America's Salvation Coast, most likely a mythological place. It is a place unlike most others, he discovers, because people "wanted him to be a Jew. The more Jewish, the better."

One day, Gazzara claps eyes on Sabitha Hunter, a young, irreverent, beautiful woman escaping her dowdy home town; her first name arose because she was born on Saturday, the Jewish Sabbath. Sabitha's fate is to be greeted as the Christian Messiah.

Both these quirky characters are featured in Get On Top, a new novel by Montreal writer David Homel (Stoddart, $22.95). If you catch the allusions to the Jewish false messiah, Shabbetai Tsvi and his tireless promoter Nathan of Gaza, you might also catch the overtones relating to the X-rated messianic pretender Jacob Franks, who proved a mega-embarrassment if not a disaster for the Jewish people.

Homel, the author of three previous novels, won a Governor General's award for translation in 1995, but one senses that Get On Top won't put him in line for any more honors. His latest work is a peculiar novel, featuring a literary orgy of sex and violence, passion and panic, and with vague similarities in sensibility to Theroux or Vonnegut.

Born and raised in Chicago, Homel once worked in a kosher slaughterhouse. He also writes for TV and radio. With Get On Top, he may be trying to put out a literary product to cash in on the millennium.

And who knows? In these crazy times, he might just succeed.

Jolson Returns: The award-winning hit musical comes back to Toronto for two weeks, now starring Mike Burstyn as the legendary American singer "who on one knee brought the whole world to its feet." Princess of Wales Theatre. April 20 to May 2. $20-$89. 872-1212 or 800-461-3333.

Jewish Film Society: New York Jewish intellectuals have wielded tremendous influence over the last half-century. Irving Kristol, Irving Howe, Daniel Bell and Nathan Glazer were four of the most prominent members of that group. Their world is profiled in Arguing the World, a recent American-made film directed by Joseph Dorman.

A press release says, "The film's greatest success is that it makes these intellectuals likable – even the ones with whom you disagree." The Toronto Jewish Film Society screenings are on April 11. Screenings at Jackman Hall, Art Gallery of Ontario. 5:15 & 7:45 p.m. Author and broadcaster Robert Fulford will introduce the film. Call 924-6211 for details.

Mom's gift includes Cabaret lead

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — An unusual, but substantial and delayed birthday gift, gives Julie Lennick the chance to play the role of her dreams – Sally Bowles, the starring role of the musical Cabaret.

The gift covers rental of the 180-seat Studio Theatre at the Ford Centre of Performing Arts in North York, from April 7 to 17, a professional cast of 16, a five-piece orchestra and royalties for the play.

"I don't know yet what it will cost me, but it will be a lot, minus the tickets that are sold," said Sylvia Lennick, doyen of a theatrical family. She will play Fraulein Schneider, Sally's landlady, a role she had 16 years ago at the St. Lawrence Centre.

Luckily, the four songs she sings are all in her key which has dropped a little since her halcyon days.

She is best known for her comic role as Julius Caesar's wife on the Wayne and Shuster Show, opining, "Julie, I told you, don't go."

"I was supposed to give Julie (her daughter) the gift last Sept. 30, but in the meantime I got a 10-week engagement at the Mayfield Dinner Theatre in Edmonton and Julie told me not to pass it up.

"The idea started in my head because I could foresee a perfect cast for Cabaret including Julie."

The gift also expresses Sylvia's confidence in the acting and singing ability of her daughter who is taking on her first professional role in Cabaret.

Up to now, she has appeared in community theatre, for example, Scarborough Village productions of Guys and Dolls (as Adelaide who is always fighting a cold) and in Grease.

Playing the role that Joel Grey made famous, the master of ceremonies at the Kit Kat nightclub in Berlin, is Mario D'Alimonte.

"Julie is the only one of the Lennicks to have the sense to hold on to a good civilian job, as a traffic coordinator with the Metro Police. Our two sons, David and Michael are in show business. David is a compiler of compact discs and Michael is a TV writer and director," said Sylvia.

Her late husband, Ben, was co-developer of the Belmont Theatre, and with Sylvia, performed for years on the CBC radio show, At Home with the Lennicks.

The performances include a Sunday matinee, April 11, at 2 p.m.

Book on Bialystok looks at vanished era

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Numerous Jews in the Diaspora can trace their ancestry to the Bialystok region of Poland, and some are travelling there to reconnect with their ancestral past.

Bialystok and the 40 towns and villages in the vicinity, known for its dense and untouched forests and its green river valleys, are rich in Jewish history.

Jews arrived in the area in the 16th century, settling not only in Bialystok, the largest city in northeast Poland, but in places like Tykocin, Bielsk Podalski, Bocki, Bransk, Narew, Orla and Wasilkow.

By the outbreak of World War II, 58 percent of greater Bialystok's population was Jewish, while Bialystok itself had the greatest concentration of Jews – 60 percent – of any city in Poland.

Among those who claim descent from Bialystok and environs are Yitzhak Shamir, Israel's former prime minister; Albert Sabin, the discoverer of the polio vaccine; Ludwik Zamenhof, the inventor of Esperanto; Eliezer Sukenik, the archeologist whose name is inextricably associated with the Dead Sea Scrolls, and whose son, Yigael Yadin, was deputy prime minister in Menachem Begin's first government; Josef Chazanowicz, a physician who was instrumental in the formation of Israel's national library; and Frederick Reines, the co-winner of the 1995 Nobel Prize for physics.

The Nazis wiped out much of Bialystok's Jewish population, consigning tens of thousands of Jews to Treblinka, the death camp halfway between Bialystok and Warsaw.

Nowadays, scarcely any Jews are left in the Bialystok area. But visitors who venture there will find synagogues, ritual bathouses, cemeteries and Jewish community buildings in various states of repair.

If you're seriously thinking of visiting, don't leave home without reading Tomasz Wisniewski's useful guidebook, Jewish Bialystok and Surroundings in Eastern Poland (The Ipswich Press, 63 South Main St., Ipswich, Mass. 01938, $18.50 Canadian).

Wisniewski, a journalist and historian, is described as an expert on Jewish history and landmarks in the Bialystok region.

His book, the only one of its kind I have seen, seems relatively comprehensive. Wisniewski recounts the history of Jews in Bialystok and its satellite towns and villages, and suggests tours to suit different schedules.

In addition, there are 77 black and white photographs and 25 maps.

The foreward is by Mimi Sheraton, a notable food writer who sings the praises of the famous Bialystok bialy, the yeasty onion and poppy seed-flecked irregularly round breakfast roll, generations of Jews have heartily consumed.

But in what is surely a sad and depressing commentary of the times, Sheraton observes that no one in Bialystok today has ever heard of the bialy.

Like the murdered Jews of Bialystok, it is a forgotten remnant of a vanished era.

Entrepreneur happily hectic in the Bulldog Group

Whatever you can do, or dream you can, begin it.
Boldness has genius, power and magic in it. – Johann Wolfgang von Goethe

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

In the winter of 1934, Lotte Rubin, a recent immigrant to Canada from Pinsk, Poland, was crossing an icy street in Edmonton when she was struck by a truck.

Rubin, the breadwinner in her family with a sick husband and three children to support, was left with two broken legs.

Not despairing over her accident, she turned adversity into fortune by collecting $3,000 – a tidy sum during the Depression – in an insurance claim from the trucking company.

With the money in hand, Lotte Rubin, a smart, courageous and tenacious woman, risked everything and bought real estate when the market was depressed. Her timing was exquisite. Within a few years, housing prices rose, and she made a handsome profit.

Her granddaughter, Ellie Rubin, likes to tell this story whenever anyone asks about her own success in business. "She's been quite inspirational to me," said Rubin, co-founder of the Toronto-based Bulldog Group and author of Bulldog: Spirit of the New Entrepreneur, published last month by HarperCollins.

But, as she hastened to add, Lotte Rubin, now 98, was not her only role model. Alex Rubin, her 76-year-old father, to whom she dedicates Bulldog, was also an inspiration– and a mentor – to her.

A real estate developer and one of the first members of the Bulldog Group's board of directors, he imparted to his daughter two values which have helped her enormously – a taste for entrepreneurship and a yen for calculated risk.

Thanks to their examples, and her own driving ambition, this 37-year-old United Synagogue Day School and McGill University graduate created a $5 million-a-year firm whose clients include Microsoft, Apple, General Motors and Sony Pictures Entertainment.

The Bulldog Group, with offices in Los Angeles, London and Amsterdam, is a leader in the rapidly-expanding media management field. Since its formation, Bulldog, with almost 50 employees, has transformed itself from a traditional design-service firm into one of North America's leading multimedia production houses.

In technical jargon, Bulldog helps companies in the entertainment, publishing, advertising, marketing and broadcasting industries realize a higher return on their production processes while better managing their media assets.

Until quite recently, Rubin was Bulldog's president. But of late, she has stopped dealing with day-to-day operations, leaving these duties to her husband and partner, Christopher Strachan.

Rubin is still very much involved with Bulldog, being its chief adviser. Nowadays, however, she spends a good part of her waking hours on the road as a consultant and speaker in Canada, Europe, Asia and the United States. Her subjects are entrepreneurship and entrepreneuring, a word she uses as a verb.

Aside from her grandmother and father, Rubin is the only businessperson in her family and among her four siblings.

Berte, Rubin's Winnipeg-born mother, earned a PhD at 65, and now works in adult education. Wendy is a crown prosecutor in Vancouver and Leslie is an artist in Israel. Benjamin, a lawyer, lives in Toronto, while Ilan, who made aliyah about 20 years ago, is secretary-general of the Jewish Agency in Jerusalem.

Rubin is no stranger to Israel either, having visited the country on a regular basis since she was six. "I have," she said, " a real connection to Israel."

Midway through her studies at at McGill, where she majored in English literature and theatre, she decided to teach theatre and dance in Israel. She ended up in Sderot, a bleak and remote Israeli development town in the Negev Desert, populated nearly exclusively by Sephardi Jews.

"I was having too much fun at university and wanted to do something difficult. I veered off the straight-and-narrow. That's when you learn the most. That was entrepreneuring!"

Sderot was certainly a challenge. "My parents were not happy with my decision to take off a year. Sderot was in the middle of nowhere. It was hard to be a single woman in a somewhat male chauvinist atmosphere."

Worse still, teachers in Sderot did not initially appreciate the utility of dance and theatre.

Ellie Rubin

Eventually, she won them over, and the experience gave her a terrific boost of self-confidence, the sine qua non of successful entrepreneurs.

Before she returned to Canada, Rubin was a housemother for six months in a kibbutz near Ashkelon. Back in Toronto, she honed her evolving business skills at the Toronto Arts Council in public relations and at a variety of advertising and marketing firms in administration.

With her husband's encouragement and assistance, she founded her own company in 1991, when Canada was in the grips of a recession. There were good times and bad times. Bulldog zoomed off the starting block, but soon was burdened by a $600,000 debt.

By dint of perseverance and grit, a capacity for bright new ideas and a talent for networking, concepts she collectively refers to as "story-telling," "championship" and "cachet," she eliminated that problem quite expeditiously.

No feminist, she does not consider herself a female entrepreneur. "I'm an entrepreneur who happens to be a woman," said Rubin, a slight, diminutive woman with curly auburn locks.

Yet, she acknowledged, there have been occasions when she has been "blocked" simply because of her gender.

As she points out in Bulldog, women are increasingly prominent in business. Female-owned businesses now account for approximately one-third of all Canadian companies and generate almost one million jobs. And since 1979, the number of women who have gone into business has increased by 150 percent.

For all her success, Rubin has had her share of failures. "I've lost bids, and I have had people hang up on me. It wasn't fun and I didn't feel good, but it built my self-confidence. You have to learn how to cope with rejection."

In general, Rubin divides her time between Toronto and Los Angeles. "It's a very hectic life, but entrepreneurship is a way of life, not a job," she said with the zeal of a new convert. "I'm happily hectic."

An avid reader and an amateur pianist who enjoys calisthenics, tennis and horseback riding, Rubin works up to 16 hours a day, which perhaps accounts for the fact that she has no children.

But Rubin is not ruling out the possibility. "You never know," she said coyly.

When it comes to her career, Rubin is not as vague. Asked what the future holds, she said she hopes to consolidate her position as an international public speaker.

"In 10 years, I want to be a world-wide expert in helping people find their entrepreneurial spirit."

With the publication of Bulldog, she has taken another bold step toward that goal.

Finish fourth in IIHF tournament

Lack of quality goaltending deflates Israeli juniors

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

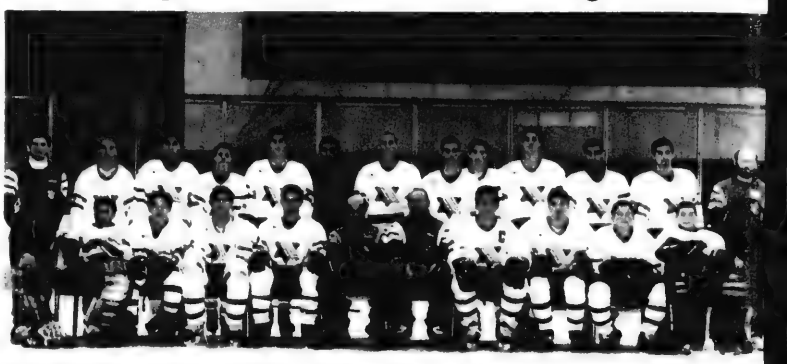
TORONTO — An apocryphal – and illustrative – story is attributed to hockey maven Gene Ubriaco. Years ago, the onetime Pittsburgh Penguins head coach was asked to comment about the importance of goaltending in hockey.

"Goaltending," the ice expert said without hesitation, "is 80 percent of hockey, unless you don't got none. Then it's 100 percent."

Ask Jeff Budd to comment, and chances are the Kitchener, Ont. native would agree with Ubriaco's opinion, if not with his grammar.

As manager of the Israeli junior hockey team, Budd recently returned from the IIHF European Junior Under-18 Championships, Division II, in Sofia, Bulgaria where he watched Israel's medal hopes slip away, thanks to weak goaltending.

A sixth-place finisher in last year's tournament, this time around Israel advanced to the medal round but was winless in three playoff games to finish fourth in the eight-team event. Spain won the gold, with the Netherlands and Belgium finishing second and third.



Israel's Under-18 junior team

"If we'd had a more mature, able goalie, we'd have a medal," Budd believes. "We could've beaten Belgium."

Hampered by their Tim Cheveldae-calibre goalie, Israel nevertheless finished ahead of Luxembourg, Bulgaria, Iceland and Ireland.

Despite his disappointment, Budd isn't blaming Israel's sabra netminder for their showing. After all, Avihu Sorotsky, is only 14 years old, one of the youngest players in the tournament. At that age, playing against boys three years his senior, his performance was understandable, Budd said.

But soft goals at inopportune moments doomed the Israelis.

In the first playoff game against Spain, "we played well for 1½ periods. Then, all of a sudden, they get five or six shots and they're all goals. It let the wind out of the team," Budd said. Israel went on to lose 10-2.

"It was the same in game two against Belgium," he added, a 14-1 loss.

At the skill positions, Israel has made tremendous strides in recent years, thanks in large part to Philadelphia Flyers' head coach, Roger Neilson. For the past two years, Neilson has run a two-week hockey school in Canada Centre's Olympic-sized rink, located in Metulla. Most of the junior team trained there under Neilson. This year, Neilson is expected to be back, with Jewish NHLer Steve Dubinsky of the Calgary Flames as a special guest instructor, Budd said.

At forward, the Israelis could play with the other Division II teams. "On defence, we were pretty good. They were able to play tough and keep the shots low. It could have been worse," he said.

Budd, who worked for 4½ years as manager of the Canada Centre rink, said the 18-man junior team consisted primarily of sabras, two Russian-born players who learned all their hockey in Israel, and four North Americans who carry Israeli passports.

Erez Eizenman, 17, and Daniel Bochner from Toronto, Yitzhak Levi from Montreal and a fourth player from New York City, bolstered the Israeli team.

Eizenman, a left winger who played for Scarborough Stallions AA Bantam team last year, was fifth in the tournament scoring with 10 goals and four assists in five games. Matan Nementoff, a sabra, was next with six goals and eight assists while defenceman Asher Moyal was 14th, with five goals and four assists. Levi, a right winger, had four goals and three assists for 23rd place and Yevgeni Kniter was 25th with four goals and two assists.

Nementoff is a veteran of the Metulla summer camp. He also attended Neilson's hockey school in Lindsay, Ont. last summer.

Eizenman, a student at CHAT, said he was surprised at his teammates' sound positional play, although their skills were a little lacking. Poor goaltending was Israel's achilles heel, he said.

In their playoff game against Spain, Israel's opponents managed only 15 shots on goal – and 11 of them went in. "That demoralized the team," he said.

Israel's rapid improvement was the talk of the town in Sofia, Budd said. The Irish team, in particular, admired the Israelis for their ability to advance to the medal round despite being a recent hockey country. Ireland, which competed in its first ever IIHF tournament has only a small, quarter-sized rink to practice and play in, Budd said.

The tournament was memorable for its goodwill, a far cry from the bad blood that marred an Under-20 event in Sofia four years ago. A game in that IIHF tournament deteriorated into a bench-clearing brawl when the Israelis got fed up with the Yugoslav team's repeated anti-Semitic taunts. Budd had to fight the Yugoslav coach when he came at him with a stick, he recalled.

There were no such extracurricular activities this year. Instead, camaraderie and respect marked the tournament, Budd said.

Still, organizers of the tournament were concerned with the Israelis' safety, not from stick-wielding Yugoslavs but from Kurds angry at the country's alleged role in kidnapping their political leader. Security for the Israelis was very tight, and two policemen were always on the same hotel floor with the team, Eizenman said.

The Israelis, coached by Simon Yakobovitz, who was once an assistant coach with the Soviet Wings, played a Canadian-style of hockey that featured strong positional play and solid hitting, Budd said. Most of the Israeli team play for Metulla in the Israeli junior league, with only one boy from Tel Aviv making the national team.

Scuttlebutt out of Israel suggests that Tel Aviv, which recently lost its mini-rink, may be getting an Olympic-sized rink soon, "but I'll believe it when I see it," Budd said.

In the meantime, Budd will continue his association with the Israeli team, raising funds to help it attend tournaments and keeping his eye out for a competent goaltender with an Israeli passport.

ספרותנו

מאת: יעל זליגר

חילדה שברחה מחמלחמה, מאת: מאירה ביין ורות קמארה, ספריית פועלים, סדרת לקורא הצעיר.

כבר נכתב רבות על כך שאנו חיים בעידן של אנואיזם צרוף; "יחילד חזה חוא אניי". וגרוע מזה, עידן שבו ילדנו חשופים לטלוויזיה שמתיימרת לחציג נכונה בפני ילדים את עולמנו. טוב, אם כן, לגלות ספרי לילדים, כתוב יפה, עם מסר אנושי-ציוני וכן מידע לימודי בעל ערך.

במרכז חדרמה ילדה קטנה, ליה שמה מארץ רחוקה, בוסניה, שעוברת ימים קשים של סבל, רעב, פחד והרג בעיר ששמה סרייבו. ובכלל מאוד כדאי לילדים קוראי עברית לקרוא על ליה מפני שסיפו חטוב של חסיפור מוביל ישירות לנושא אחבת ישראל.

ובכן, חוריה של ליה מחליטים שאת בתם צריך להוציא מסרייבו. בתחילה חשבו לשלוח אותה לדודה בניו-יורק אלא שיש חשש שבניו יורק ליה תשכח מהר מאד שחיא יחודיה שכן חדודה בעצמה כבר לא זוכרת את יחדותה. וכך חוחלט לשלוח את ליה לישראל. אמת, גם בישראל בעיות ואולי לא כל כך בטוח אבל "בישראל שומרים חיטב על ילדים." ליה שלנו תיסע לשם."

חסיום? ראשית, מסתבר ש"סבא" אינו סתם איש בא בימים מסרייבו אלא סופר שכתב ספרים ידועים על יוגוסלביה וחוא זח שבזכות מאמציו ושקריו יצליח לאחד את חמשפחה ולחביא גם את אמא ואבא של ליה לישראל. סוף טוב.

מי ייתן ועושה שלום במרומיו יביא שלום על כל חילדים שלנו ועל כל ילדי חעולם.

About families

Dear Susan,

I am confused about a child's tendency to lie and its possible significance. My son is seven, and I have noticed that he tends to lie when he feels insecure. Do you have any suggestions?

Dear Reader,

Your question addresses a fundamental element in a child's development – the fact that lying is a completely normal behavior in children of a certain age.

Children of four, five and six may lie as part of their propensity to see the world as larger than life. The lie may be understood as embellishment and elaboration, and reflective of the child's tendency to see the world in terms of polar opposites.

During these years it is important for parents to stress to the child the differences between the real and the imaginary world. Children need to explore these differences in their play as well as in their day to day contact with people.

At age six or seven, children begin to develop a social conscience. They may exercise these newly developed perceptions by playing both judge and jury simultaneously. This is when they can develop a rather pronounced sense of right and wrong, which can result in profoundly judgmental attitudes and behaviors.

At age seven, children begin to master tasks and relationships. Sometimes a child's struggle to gain control over their world seems insurmountable, so they exaggerate their achievements.

As a parent, you need to appreciate your child's struggle. This is his way of articulating these worries and coping with the challenges he faces. In a child of this age, this insecurity may also manifest itself in stealing, which will often be a cry for attention.

Indulge your child's imagination, and try to get to the bottom of his concerns. Encourage dialogue, rather than acting out. If your child has perfectionist tendencies, try to make him understand that it is okay to be imperfect. Above all, teach him to admit to his behavior, whether it is good, bad or otherwise, and to have the courage to bear the consequences.

I want to thank you for your loyal following during the past few years. I have enjoyed writing for The CJN, who gave me total creative licence to explore developmental and family issues. In the past year, it also supported my writing about more controversial issues, and I want to thank The CJN for being so open-minded and courageous in its support of these family issues.

Since The CJN is making some changes, it is time for me to say goodbye. To the readers and to my family who have encouraged my writing, I want to say a special thanks.

I wish you all well and applaud The CJN for encouraging new talent as it so generously did with me.

Sincerely,
Susan Leventhal

"Learning"

Elie Benzaquen

Telling us the messages they keep in their hearts

It is wonderfully exhilarating to observe how deeply compelling is the need for a large number of our readers to write, to recount memories, tell stories, write poetry, simply to loosen the reins of imagination and let fly the winged steeds of their innermost thoughts and aspirations.

The CJN's Third Annual Passover Literary Supplement was a great success. It again attracted submissions far in excess of the number we could publish. Many of those submissions soared high with the eagles, using bold, rich imagery and stirring strong, powerful emotions.

The rules that governed our decision-making process were quite simple. We chose well-written, imaginative pieces that were eclectic and widely representative of subjects and writing styles, each work featuring some aspect of unique point and spark.

As in the preceding years, at least half of the entries, both prose and poetry, explored and delved into Holocaust-related themes. But unlike previous years, the majority of these authors were not the survivors themselves, but their children and grandchildren. The links in the chain have been forged.

We received a number of submissions from very young authors. Thus we reproduced a representative sampling of those submissions as well.

Especially gratifying, however, was the fact that we continued to receive works from new writers, from people who had never sent us their writings before. We deliberately chose to highlight some of these "first-timers" in the supplement.

In a departure from past practice, we have also included two important works of non-fiction in the supplement, by Rabbi Shlomo Jakobovits and Wendy Goldblatt Schneider.

As a visual punctuation and complement to the prose and poetry on these pages, the supplement also features the artistry of 33-year-old artist, rabbi, sofer (scribe) and film animator, Elie Benzaquen. As the depictions of his work will attest, Benzaquen possesses rare talent and great skill. He focuses on traditional Judaic themes. In doing so, he brings to life, with a certain sweet and sublime innocence, the tenderness and beauty in many of the key symbols of our heritage and in many of the key relationships in our homes and families.

Passover is the perfect time to "roll out" our Literary Supplement. The poem, inserted in this editorial, by Brenda Spigelman Ajzenkopf, entitled The Telling, explains why.

Writing is telling.

Some authors prefer the leeway of verse; others prefer the cadence and the format of prose. But each author is telling us of the messages they keep in their hearts. The Passover seder is also about telling. That is its key purpose, to enable us and our children to understand that as we sit round the table, we are all, in a sense, as Elijàh, peering with his ancient eyes from the past and far into the future of Jewish history.

MBD

The Telling

Why is this night unlike all others
Are questions the youngest must say
We recline, we pray, we ask the Almighty
Please deliver us from Egypt this day.

Bitters and herbs are ours to consume
To remember the Exodus then
We eat, we drink, we cross the waters
Are pursued by Pharaoh and his men.

The Haggadah reading commands that we tell
How our ancestors toil, how they cry
We plead, we bend, we climb with Moses
And receive the tablets at Mount Sinai.

Elijah is here my father sings out
All bear witness as he flies
We tremble, we hide, we wait as he nears
We peer down through his ancient eyes.

A Mother's Kiss From The Grave

By IBOLYA GROSSMAN

I went back to Hungary in the summer of 1989 to attend the 45th memorial service for the Jews who had been deported from Pecs, my birthplace. My parents had been among the deportees.

After the service, I travelled to Budapest where I heard a story about close friends who had resided in the same apartment building as I had. I went back to the old building at 16 Nepszinhaz St.

Before my escape from Hungary with my son, we lived in this seven-storey building. Visiting a few elderly couples in the building brought back sad memories.

This building was already very old before the war, but at that time it was still in good condition – clean inside and out. It had courtyards in the front and back, housing more than 300 people in 92 units. Children were not allowed to be noisy and pets had to be kept inside the apartments.

This was the house from which my young husband had been taken in 1943. He was sent to a forced labor camp and later killed.

This was the house where I had been frightened by every knock on the door, afraid that the police or the Nazis had come for me. In this apartment I slept fully dressed on top of the bed, ready to hide if the Arrow Cross bandits (Hungarian Nazis) came for me during the night.

It was from this house that we were taken on Oct. 15, 1944 and brought to a racetrack, rounded up with many thousands of other Jews from across the city. Threatened by machine guns, we were held at the racetrack for two days, without food, water, or a roof over our heads.

Later we were taken to the ghetto in Budapest.

On Jan. 18, 1945, the day of our liberation, I staggered, starving, back to the old apartment building to beg for some food from the superintendent.

This was the house I escaped from in 1949 with my young son, but we were captured and I was jailed. The opportunity to escape again came seven years later and this time we were lucky.

For years I had nightmares about Hungary. I dreamed I returned there and I couldn't get out again. I didn't want to go back, despite the fact that my late husband's parents still lived in that old building on Nepszinhaz Street.

When I finally visited the place in 1989, it was in very bad shape. Tall beams had been installed in many places to keep the building from collapsing and the walls were dirty and peeling everywhere. Weeds were growing between the worn-down red cobblestones of the courtyards, garbage was piled up in the front and many dogs were roaming about, barking loudly.

When the daughter of one of my former neighbors learned that I was in Budapest, she organized a get-together with some other young women who were also childhood playmates of my son. They had all resided in the old apartment building when they were children.

On a summer afternoon we met in the Hauer Pastry shop. I remembered the shop from many years back for its excellent tortes.

Although I hadn't seen them since they were little girls, I was still able to recognize the young women. Like my son, they all had teenage children.

Over a cup of good coffee and a slice of dobos torte we talked about their lives in Hungary and my life in Canada.

Marta, one of the women, mentioned that her 20-year-old daughter had recently been married. She recalled her own wedding day some 20 years earlier and how she had missed the presence of her mother who had died years before.

Then Marta told an unusual story about a strange encounter she had had the very day of her wedding.

Late that afternoon, a car stopped in front of Marta and her new husband's home. A short, graying, middle-aged woman got out and went through the open gate of the garden straight toward her.

"I'm looking for Galambos Marta," she said.

"I am Galambos Marta. Can I help you?"

Then without a word the little woman hugged Marta warmly and planted a kiss on both of her cheeks.

"I have wanted to do this for a long, long time," she said, "to kiss you and thank you for saving my life."

"How did I save your life?" Marta asked in astonishment.

"It was your parents," the woman answered.

Marta stopped to gather her thoughts and then continued. She recounted the woman's story which had taken place during the war.

The Judean Desert at Night

The beauty of your harshness stirs my soul
Sitting under the stars in the Judean Desert
That desert sky of my dreams the stars ... the night
Your stillness hides a secret
The secret of our past,
The mystery of what will come
I hear voices in these rolling hills, desert hills of dust and rock
Who can tell about your soul?
I smell it in the dust of the cool night wind
The dogs know about it, they howl
Perfect emptiness
Like a Bedouin I want to belong to your land learn to respect your nature
Tonight I will sleep in your outstretched arms and let you envelop me in the desert night.

The taxi driver took pity on her

It was 1943, and a young woman walked aimlessly through the streets of Budapest. Finally she flagged down a taxi. When the driver asked where she would like to go, she started to cry.

Between sobs she said that she was Jewish and lived on the outskirts of the city. She was afraid to go home because her parents had been taken away with the rest of the Jews that day. She had nowhere to go.

The taxi driver took pity on her and offered to take her to his home at 16 Nepszinhaz St. for the night. He lived there with his wife and baby daughter.

The one night stretched into many months. The taxi driver and his family hid her, despite the fact that his wife was also Jewish.

They lived at the back of the building on the third floor. Across from them lived a man who belonged to the Arrow Cross party. He was hostile and dangerous and everybody in the building feared him.

One day, he took the taxi driver's wife and another Jewish woman from the house to the nearby square and shot both of them in the back of the head.

The driver's wife wore a heavy winter coat with a thick fur collar standing upright. That collar saved her life. By some miracle, the bullet got stuck in the fur, unable to penetrate its thickness.

"The taxi driver was my father and the baby girl was me," recalled Marta.

Unfortunately, Marta's father was captured and sent to a concentration camp where he died. The woman who was hiding in their home ended up at Auschwitz, but she survived. After the war, she went to Israel where she married and had a family.

On that summer night, Marta's wedding day, the woman's wish – to kiss and thank the child of the family who hid her and saved her life– finally came true.

Marta finished her story. Tears gathered in my eyes as I recalled her parents, people I had known very well. Then hugging her I said in a low voice:

"Do you know, my child, that it was your mother who kissed you on your wedding day through that strange woman?"

"I thought so too, Aunt Ibi," Marta answered.

"But how did she know your new address?" I asked her.

"She went to the old house on Nepszinhaz Street to inquire about us from the superintendent. But the super was new and couldn't give any information. So she sent her up to Susie's parents who still live on the second floor. Because Susie is my best friend, her parents knew my address."

I talked a while longer with these women, reminiscing about their childhoods. Then we said our farewells. I was sad, knowing that this was probably our last meeting and I would not see them again.

I have nothing left in Hungary – only painful memories. I do not intend to go back again.

Passover Greetings

For Isaac

A head on my shoulder,
My arms encircle his warm
little body,
My fingers entwine his golden curls.
My child's child.

Born in love
And born in freedom,
No need for his silken curls
To leave his mother's side.

Memories of curls
That tumbled round his mother's face.
What we give, we owe to many:
Fathers, driven to despair,
Mothers, tears in angst-filled eyes,
These, remembering tumbling
curls
Would smile to see him now.

Once a child of golden curls Child half-orphaned, loving mother –
Only love! No food to give A child of eight, a child who wandered
Across the land, across the sea.
Eating, sleeping, when there was
A friendly hand, a bit of work.

A father, helpless, desperate,
Nights of terror blind his eyes,
Lacking money for a bribe.
Chestnut curls, not ten years;
Abandoned, left to menial tasks,
While he went on to find for them
A new way, a new life.

Small sweet heads with auburn
curls,
Hidden deep in fragrant hay.
A wink, a handshake, and a wagon
Lumbering on across the border.
A mother strong and loving, looking Selfless to the future, for her family,
Knowing no survival whence she came.

A head on my shoulder,
My arms encircle his warm
little body,
My fingers entwine his golden
curls.
My child's child.

Dearest child, what we give
Is not what we ourselves created,
But a gift that others gave,
Fleeing peril, hate, unrest.
Dreaming of a better world.
It is ours to pass to you.
It now is yours to guard.

The Plum Tree

i. Young boy – a son and brother – you are a mentor and protector to so many.
Uprooted at an early age – father deceased, mother struggling to raise a young family.

ii. The streets of your village are awash with scholars who study with the great rebbe –
Talmud, Mishnah, Chumash, Halachah.
You peer through the dusty cheder windows,
longing to join them.
You are too young yet.
And yet, you are too old…
The branch that your mother and siblings cling to for support.
You must bear fruit for the others,
and labor to do so.

iii. Nature can be merciless at times, giving and then taking away,
wiping out traces of life and beauty.
In time, a dreadful storm comes, wiping out that cheder, that village…
your dear ones.

iv. But you, thank God, have been able to root temporarily in other places.
And slowly, slowly, you awaken
after that harsh, stormy winter.
Weakened, you are warmed by the sun;
your fragility begins to heal.
And you are replanted yet again.

v. A husband. A father.
A mentor and protector once more.
You move sliently into your verdant garden and kneel, shovel and soil beside you.
You recall Leviticus 19:23.
"And when you arrive in the land, plant all manner of fruit trees…"

vi. You are giving back to the earth, enriching it with new life. A plum tree.
Roots clinging to the cool earth, the tree grows, flourishes…its branches strong.
Over time it bears fruit, and more fruit.
You harvest from its sweet gifts –
again and again,
repeating the cycle each year.

And you remember your roots…

vii. "And he shall be like a tree planted by the rivers of water, that bringeth forth his fruit in his season;
his leaf also shall not wither;
and whatsoever he doeth shall prosper."

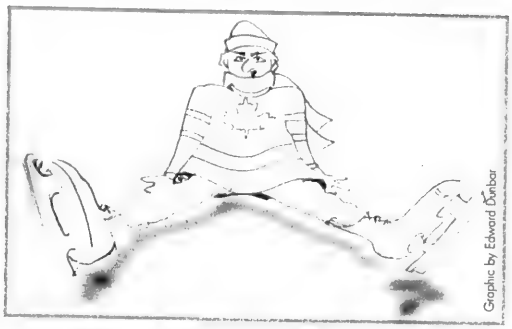
The Ice Kiss

By RONALD RUSKIN



Graphic by Edward Barbar

Before Chanukah my bubba complained of terrible pain. It had always been there but with the cold it ached to move.

"Arthritis," Bubba said. "I should go, like Dr. Cole says, to Florida and lie in the sun. Burning heat will do my joints good."

"Go before winter comes, Bubba."

"But Reuben, Tatilla. You're all by yourself."

The cold air cut her breath short and she wheezed. Outside, cold winds twisted her back so she limped. Nights, she drank brandy and rubbed Ben-Gay on her body. She snored in the bed beside me and exhaled alcohol and wintergreen fumes in the dark. Mornings, she rose before me and made breakfast for my parents. When I came to the kitchen they had gone and she set down a cup of hot tea, cod liver oil, an egg and toast, and read the Toronto Star with her thick accent.

"Careful. Ize. Go slow to school. It's very izey."

"Ice, Bubba." I pointed to the newspaper. "Say icccce."

"Ize," she said. "I can read by myself fine."

Trucks spun out of control; people broke legs on ice and froze to death. She told this to me every morning as I ate my toast. She warned that I could get sick from cold, catch pneumonia, and die young.

"Reuben. Come here. Give me a look before you go. A kiss too."

She made a daily inspection before school, checking my hair, face, nose, tongue, then my coat, gloves, toque, scarf, and boots.

"Bubba. Don't worry." I kissed her. "Florida. Remember?"

"Reuben what are you hiding?" she paused. "In behind your back, hanging with white laces. Show me, you little tyvel."

Reluctantly, I pushed them to the front. "Skates," I said.

"Skates? Those leather boots with knives on the bottom?"

"These are my good friend Danny Gold's ice-skates."

"Ize skates? Ay. Those are butcher knives. For ize?"

"For ice. Iccce."

"Answer a question. Why do you have his ize-skates?"

"He says to use them!" Such lies I told. "Whenever I like. I'm a good skater."

Bubba ran her finger along the sharp edge of the skate blade. "Gevalt! With this you kill a chicken."

"I need to play with the boys," I said. "Skating is fun."

"Fun? Vas is das fun?" Bubba said. "With such big feet?"

The honest truth was I never skated before. Danny Gold's boots were three sizes too big, with no ankle support. The big lout! I had to beg him to give me his boots. I needed practice. Lacing them on the hall rug and standing still 10 seconds was agony. But who cared? My parents were too busy with work to buy me skates and Bubba hated winter because it reminded her of the Nazis.

When I opened the door to leave, Bubba grabbed me "Ssh! Listen!" She told me a story about a boy who played hockey until a puck hit him in the head and both eyes fell out. I escaped before she finished – her stories ended in blindness, death, paralysis, or total idiocy. Lullabies she never had. Nighttime she put me to bed with tales of incurable diseases, children wheezing in iron lungs, orphans starving in icy beds, Jews fleeing the Nazis just like Pharoah.

Someone, Bubba said, had seen Hitler after the war – he had moved to northern Ontario, near the Jewish camps. I had strange dreams. Winter was Satan's shadow that lay beyond the snow. To fight back, Bubba told hideous stories.

"Ize is the dybbuk," Bubba said. "Don't let him get you!"

When I lit the menorah at night she caught me with my fingers in the fire. If you moved your fingers quick through the flames; it gave a warm tickle and blackened your skin.

"Gott, Reuben, you'll burn your face off! That's what."

"I'm keeping the dybbuk away. See? Look. He's not here yet!"

Bubba hit me so hard I saw stars. "Don't give the dybbuk ideas."

Towards December, the light shifted. Bubba said that evil hovered over the hard earth and bare, dark trees. Satan painted the sky blue and purple, and planted ice and snow so that we would fall and die. Ice and darkness were in the beginning of the world, it was written in the holy books. But I did not believe her and I prayed for that color of light; I rushed to the window and pressed my cheek and lips against the pane for the frosted kiss that brought ice. The first ice formed a thin skin over the brown earth, black and clear or frosted white.

Sliding across ice in my boots, I dreamed. I turned, I did figure-eights, I leaned close to the ice, I skimmed side and back like the older boys when they played hockey.

My problem was that my parents worked and Bubba hated ice.

Ice was the devil's work. She threatened to take me to Florida for the heat.

"Bubba," I said. "You go first. Dr. Cole says go to Florida for Passover."

"What does Cole know? Come with me and you'll get color in your face."

I lost sleep over Florida

I lost sleep over Florida. Dreaming of lying on a towel with Bubba spreading olive oil beside me made me sick. She was hunched up with brown walnut skin and prune eyes that grew milky with age. In the nights she smelled of whisky and wintergreen and her false teeth chattered about salt water and Florida sun. I prayed for ice to come in December and stay until May; I wanted cold air to bite my cheeks and I dreamed of flying over ice like the older boys.

Bubba didn't understand. She spoke Yiddish and I spoke hockey.

Before and after school, whenever he would let me – which wasn't often – I tried on Danny Gold's skates at the outdoor rink. I held the boards and tiptoed along the ice. I was a lousy skater. I fell to the side. I fell on my head. My ankles ached. I had swollen knees and a bleeding nose. I couldn't turn and it was impossible to stop. Danny's skates were huge and my feet were small: I was already sliding in his skates, not to mention on the ice.

The worst part was Bubba. The first week, she limped to the rink. Such a pair of invalids! We hung onto the boards; I hobbled onto the ice like a cripple and Bubba yelled in her accent.

"Reuben? Don't be meshuge! What's a Jew to do on a goyish hockey tink?"

"Rink! And don't say that! Normal people skate. Who told you to come?"

"Reuben? This is what you do after school? Go already, fall down. With Danny Gold's skates? Gevalt! On ize yet, such torture? A sickness will come!"

"You want me to fall. I'll fall. Watch me platz. Will that make you happy?"

I was dying of shame. I let go of the boards and dove forward, first with my left foot, then my right. I dug Danny Gold's skates into the ice and gritted my teeth. Half-running, sliding. Who knows what spirit possessed me? I closed my eyes.

I heard Bubba rant in Yiddish. "You'll crash, you'll get concussion and never walk or talk again."

I lurched madly ahead and swirled into a world of ice. I didn't care. I wanted to skate like the goyish hockey players, unafraid.

Two months before Passover, Bubba's pain got worse. At the time I was worried that the Stanley Cup finals would end up on a seder night and I would miss the playoffs. One day, I came home after skating and Bubba was gone. My room stunk of wintergreen and brandy, and there in the bed beside me was Bubba, under the covers in the dark, a nightlight on.

On the night table was a glass of water with her dentures, like two married turtles. She shifted in bed.

"Cold everywhere. In my joints," Bubba said. "So, how was your skate?"

"I flew today," I said. "Dr. Cole says you should go to Florida."

"What does he know? I take pills and still the pain."

"Bubba?" I came closer. "Can I get you some hot tea?"

"It's not hot tea I need. It's the ize in my chest. Give me a kiss, little skater."

"An aspirin, then." I kissed her. "You look sick, Bubba." She tried to smile.

"It's nothing," she sighed. "Reuben, how can you love the cold so much?"

She died that night, and the next day she was buried. Before the service we saw her one last time and my mother whispered to kiss Bubba goodbye. Her forehead felt frozen.

When we got to the cemetery, there was fresh snow around and the sky had turned blue and purple, the color of the devil. It was bitter outside but I was warm in my toque, scarf, jacket and boots, just like Bubba wanted.

The cantor shivered as he sang K'El Maleh Rachamin, and I cried and couldn't stop when I felt the sadness in the air. They shoveled in the smoking, fresh dug earth and my Bubba was gone.

But in the cold and snow I felt her kiss forever and I prayed that there were also angels in the ice.

Remember

Listen to the silent sounds,
Hear unspoken words.
Listen to six million voices,
and remember.

Watch the evil that never was,
see what never happened,
Live the horrors our brothers lived
and remember.

Listen to a silent world see so many evils gently soothe a baby's cry
and remember.

Listen to the silence; and sing
Hear unspoken words; and speak
See what never happened;
and remember, remember.

Memories

If I could capture every ray of sun in my palm, and laugh back its warmth in my mind whenever I felt cold, I would never be frozen in this time, in this ghetto.

If I could capture every bird's song in my heart and sing back its melody in my mind whenever I was lonely, we would always be together in this ghetto.

If I could take the sweet scent of a flower on my breath and breathe in its taste every time I felt hungry, I would never again have to starve in this ghetto.

If I could capture all the memories of another life and cram them into this cage that I live in and replay them over and over, like a silent film in my mind and soul, I would not suffer so much, here in this ghetto.

If I could just grasp the world and shake it, hard, maybe they would listen, or hear or understand, that I, Chana, am cold and hungry, here, alone, trapped and scared in this ghetto.

by Tamar Rubin

A Reflection

I stand here by myself, a child all alone,
too old to move on,
too shamed to go home.
Lonely and crying,
I turn around,
to face my directions,
a peace newly found.
South is my childhood, fading and cold,
a faraway kingdom,
dusty and old,
North is my future,
but too far to walk,
an open window,
sealed with a lock.
West are people,
emotions, and wings,
a place for bravery courage and kings.
East is someplace out of my reach,
a place that is yonder,
a place without speech.
a piece of heaven.
a slice of sky.
They call it Zion and hopes are high.

The Magic Seder Plate

By DEBORAH DURBIN
11 years old

"Hey, Sandy, are you ready to go to the store?

"Ya, Rachel, I'll be right there!"

Oh, hi! I didn't see you there. I go to West Prep school...

"Rachel, let's go."

"O.K. Sandy."

Gee, being here in the store reminds me of something. I'll tell you about it. About a year ago I was here at this store. I was looking at seder plates. One of them had a picture of a man on it. The man looked like my zayde. I've never seen him, just pictures. He died a few months before I was born. Anyway, I decided to buy the seder plate.

Then I went home. When I got home, I went to my room. A small version of my zayde came out of the seder plate. It said "Hi! I've come to see you."

"I've got to tell my parents," I said, running out of the room.

"No!" he said in a firm voice. "This is between you and me."

"OK I won't tell anybody," I said. "But, why?"

"Not important," he said. "First things first. Now, where can I sleep?" he asked.

"I have a doll house," I said, and took him downstairs. He liked it but said it was too girly.

I said, "I can take you when I go to get furniture for my doll house tomorrow, but you have to sleep here tonight."

When we got to the store the next day, I pretended zayde was a doll for my doll house. That way he could tell me what he wanted in his room. He chose a gold iron bed with a blue blanket, a dark brown desk, a night table and a white work light. He asked me how I was going to pay for it.

I said, "I got a $100 birthday present from your wife."

"Oh" he said. "How is she doing?"

"Great!" I said.

Next I bought all the doll house food the store had.

"How are you going to pay for this?" he asked.

"Early afikoman money," I said. "I asked my parents, and stop worrying so much. I won't buy anything I can't afford."

When we got home, we set up the furniture. For a week we had fun together. I said good night to him before I went to bed. I played doll house with him. (It was really fun because he could walk and talk himself, not like my other dolls.)

One day when I went down to say good morning, he said, "I have to go. I just wanted to see you. You are the only grandchild I've never met. Good bye Rachel. I love you," he said. Then he disappeared.

It's funny, you know. People hope to welcome Elijah on Passover, but this year I didn't need him. I had my own miracle.

Sanctification and Greek Dessert

By RABBI MAURICE MYEROWITZ

I don't remember ever seeing my grandfather smile. Certainly he never hugged me, or any of his grandchildren. Not a kiss, not a gift not even a pleasant word. A stern man, perhaps his experience in the Russian pogroms had robbed him of any feelings of affection.

My grandmother was in total awe of him. His five children, of whom my mother was the eldest, at best tolerated him, but there was never the slightest hint of endearment between them.

When he and his family, having escaped Russian persecution, arrived in the thriving English northwest port of Liverpool, the Jewish community had already been established there for some years, and characteristically welcomed them and the many other families who had managed to reach those friendly shores. Rental homes were found for them on Moon Street in the heart of the Jewish district; semi-detached houses, small but neat, each with different colored drapes, so that their occupants would more easily recognize them. They were given a little money to help them start a business. Some traversed the cobblestoned streets with a wheelbarrow and old clothes for sale. Others sharpened knives or sold blocks of salt. My grandfather filled a small suitcase with shoelaces, polish, brushes and the like, and went knocking door-to-door to sell his wares in order to make a living for his family.

The years went by and the suitcase graduated into a store, that although closed on Sabbath and festivals, made for a comfortable existence. His friends had also been modestly successful, yet they all remained on Moon Street, a happy little self-imposed ghetto, strongly, if not fanatically religious, and now, in their own turn, helping their co-religionists who had managed to escape the anti-Semitic barbarism and torment of a newly created terror called Nazism. For this was the 1930s and the whole world trembled on the brink of destruction.

My grandparents spoke mainly Yiddish and as little English as they needed. We children, of course, spoke English in school, unless we wanted to discuss a teacher or some non-Jewish classmates in less than a complimentary manner. Then we would revert to mameloshen, the mother tongue, that wonderful mix of many languages and colorful phraseology that no one who was not Jewish could possibly understand. We were able to gossip about them, laugh at them, even throw in a few choice curses; and although they may have suspected that they were the brunt of our sneers, they could not comprehend a word and were unable to prove the allegations that they felt were justified. Having grandparents who spoke only Yiddish proved to be a real advantage.

My parents sent me to the local cheder, afternoon Hebrew school, three times a week. There, together with my friends, I began to study the translation and meaning of our prayers. We all could already read Hebrew fluently, as the result of attending synagogue worship with our fathers on a regular basis, and had no problem in following the services. The rabbi never had to call out page numbers for us.

Our teacher was a pleasant young man, who also led our Sabbath services, as he had a fine voice; he gave sermons, read the Torah, blew the shofar on Rosh Hashanah, married the young, visited the sick, attended funerals and, in addition to all this, acted as executive director of his small congregation. He came from the Welsh valleys that produced so many rabbis, cantors and teachers, and he spoke English with the beautiful lilt of that musical centre of the British Isles.

He taught us many new English words and phrases. Abraham, Isaac and Jacob became our patriarchs, their wives were suddenly matriarchs. Together they were transformed into ancestors. Yom Tov was now a festival, Yom Kippur, the Day of Atonement and Kiddush, he informed us, meant sanctification. We were only 6 or 7 years old, yet we already had a fine command of the English language, thanks to our Hebrew teacher, the Reverend Isaac Hoffman.

Passover was fast approaching and we quickly learned the Four Questions in Hebrew, English and Yiddish, in order to satisfy parents and grandparents alike. We had also studied the table of events at the seder, as it was now our duty to direct the course of the ceremony: Wash the hands, break the middle matzah, eat the bitter herbs; and of course, to start the seder, say Kiddush – the sanctification.

I was the eldest grandchild. None of my cousins could yet read as fluently as I, as the next in line was only 5 years of age. And so, on that first seder night we returned from shul and sat down at the table that was, itself, truly a "thanks offering to God, Who had brought us out of the land of Egypt;" with the finest silver my grandparents possessed, seder plates, flickering candles pointing their flames heavenwards, a whiter-than-white tablecloth, decanters of wine, all in an atmosphere of spiritual warmth and family togetherness.

Grandfather gazed at the scene before him

Grandfather stood at the head of the table, gazing at the scene before him, like a general surveying his troops. Each of us was examined from head to toe, the girls in their new dresses, the boys wearing their new pants and shirts. Shining faces, shining shoes, clean hands and pure hearts, the season of freedom was upon us; the time had come to recount the story of the Exodus, and to lean in comfort.

The general grunted "Nu?" a Yiddish sound that could mean anything you wanted it to, from "How have you been keeping since we last met?" to "I hear you sold the store because business was bad." This "nu," however, was directed at me, and meant, "So what are you waiting for? Let's begin already."

My father nodded encouragingly to me; my mother smiled nervously. All eyes were focused in my direction and I heard myself say in a tiny voice that seemed to be coming from many miles away: "Kiddush, say the sanctification."

There was a moment of deathly silence and total disbelief.

Grandfather shot up out of his chair. His beard jutted forward menacingly. His face was red. He was glaring at me as though I were a soldier found guilty of cowardice in the face of the enemy.

"Sanctification?" he shouted, as though the word was a personal insult. "Vos heist sanctification?" (What's the meaning of sanctification?) And then, in order to teach me properly how to introduce the seder, and to embarrass me thoroughly in the presence of all the family, he made it very clear how a little boy of seven should play his part. "Az mer kumt fun shul macht men kiddush." ("When you come from shul you make kiddush.")

In other words, "Speak mameloshen, and never, ever translate into English or any other language."

I was devastated. My parents tried to comfort me, but in vain. The salt water that symbolized the tears of the slaves in Egypt was nothing compared with the real tears coursing down my cheeks.

Eventually, we reached the part of the seder that all children look forward to with great anticipation – the search for the afikoman – a piece of matzah that is hidden and must be found before the seder can continue. Everyone looked at me, waiting for the announcement that would send the little ones running in all directions in a frenzied endeavor to find it, because the one who did so would receive the promise of a gift in exchange. Well, I had never received a gift from grandfather on Pesach or any other holiday. And, to coin a phrase: "Why would this night be different from all other nights?"

But this was not the main reason I refused to announce: "afikoman," and explain what it was. You see, I didn't have the courage, because my teacher, the Reverend Hoffman, had taught us that afikoman was a Greek word meaning dessert or entertainment.

Young though I was, I imagined my grandfather's fury. Sanctification was one thing. Greek dessert would have been the last straw, the final insult. He would have yelled: "Voss heist Greek dessert?" and had a heart attack on the spot. I wanted no part of it. I closed my eyes tight and pretended to be asleep. I wondered what new translations the Reverend Hoffman would teach us for next Pesach. It didn't bear thinking about.

And then I heard those final words of the seder: "Next Year In Jerusalem," and I prayed hard it might be so. After all, in Israel Kiddush would be Kiddush, afikoman would be afikoman. No more sanctification, no more dessert, no more English, no more Greek. Just good old Hebrew. Freedom at last!

Edith's Sabbath Candles

My mother's Sabbath candles,
They were such a magnificent sight,
My mother's Sabbath candles,
How brilliant they shone that night.

She would bless our home and family,
Behind the fingers – shrouded face,
Tears mixed with joy and sorrow,
On the face of our Sabbath Queen.

My mother's Sabbath candles,
Haunt me, now that she is gone,
Her head-covering and the apron,
The covered challah, salt, knife, and wine.

Sweet memories, take me back…
To childhood; I had my mother then,
My mother's Sabbath candles,
Not dimmed by the passage of time.

Where Birds Sing

It is written
You took us out of bondage, gave us manna and parted the Red Sea yet You rebuked Your angels because they sang while Egyptians drowned.
You cried: "Why do you sing?
They too are My children."

Sovereign of all that exists forgive my presumption for my mind is veiled.
You did decree:
"Thou shalt have no other gods."

For moments in time
we flourished and once again
man became complacent, self-worshipping . . . still, You showed mercy.

Your chosen people survived the Inquisition, Stalin and Hitler.

Moans from innocent souls echoed in heaven's chambers, human ashes turned grass grey
I wept in silence.

Surely Your intervention softened the gentile heart and behold . . .
The State of Israel reborn!

Pioneers turned swamp and sand into orange groves, carob trees, fields of corn and young forests
where birds sing.
"If you will it, it is no dream."

With heads bowed, we embraced the Western Wall in silent prayer of thanksgiving.

Hands joined, rhythmic feet danced the Horah, voices soared in song.
"Hatikvah!"

Such rejoicing, such profound sense of freedom I had never known and I, I have dignity!
I belong!
Still blood flows.

Today I feel Your anger.
It grieves me.
But not all of Your children have fallen from grace.
I kow You to be a merciful God.
"Give Me ten righteous men," You said.
Are not our houses of worship brimming with righteous men to temper Your displeasure?

God and God of my Fathers once again I ask Your pardon for my doubt-divided mind.
But I am frightened for my people.
Your creatures, Your Yerusholayim.

Every corner of our sphere
echoes of lust, greed and persecution.
Once again Hitler's graven image looms . . . swastikas flutter in the winds.
Will the predators never be stilled?

I have seen Your wrath.
With one thrust the lights went out.
Has the time come for another Ark . . . ?

Alchemy

Out of the shadow of time brutally you descend upon me
Gray, cold-damp November. Harbinger of long, stark winter
Your forecast of the icy season is not my affliction.
For I am plunged into grim dismay in blue-sky Florida, or in sun-kissed New-Age California as I try to escape you.
You torment me in my routine life in chilly Toronto.

No need for a calendar. Carved into my soul are you, oh evil night.
November ninth of hellish memory the date.
Around you stalks the remaining month like the angel of death and screams me awake to your looming presence.
They named you, Kristallnacht! What cruel irony, a paradox.
Crystal reflecting shimmering sparkle, but you depict man debased.

Mob hatred, ruptures morality in volcano of shattered glass.
Yesterday's prayers like burning tears flicker in holy ashes.
Unleashed frenzy penetrating the very fibre of time
A paradigm, the licence for Third Reich atrocities to follow
Bellowing smoke writes history's ultimate shame.
Death rattles in volume and still the world looks on.

But I am alive to avenge the beloved souls in sacred honor
Not in like; I will not be pulled into Satan's sphere.
In freedom of choice I flee anguish and impotence of depression and seek out victims of present tyranny.
Orphans of raped Bosnia tenderly I hug and feed and sell your widows' hand-knit rainbow colored socks.

Embargo child Aisha one in my heart with Ari of the Holy Land.
A sandwich for the homeless of our city's streets.
I hail Amnesty's fight for justice in the Argentine.
Sixty years almost to the day this upcoming anniversary and at last torment is transformed; guilt surrendered
Know my beloved slain your white light is the victor.
Love the Alchemist.

The Story of Passover

By PENNY LEVINE

Passover begins for Jews in the fall. That's the time we receive our Jewish calendar and say, "Oy! Passover is late this year."

The next people to discover this news are Air Canada, Delta, U.S. Air and any other airline that flies to Florida. The length of a winter's stay in Florida is dependent on the dates of our first and second seder.

So here we are back home in April, shopping for matzah, sweet red wine, chocolates and flowers. It's in between seasons, so we can wear the same outfits we wore for yontef. A couple of calls to friends and we have the six extra bridge chairs we need.

So it is 6:15 p.m., and we're in a small traffic jam because everyone is going in the same direction. Mothers and kids are let off at the door as Daddy looks for a parking space.

Jimmy, the doorman of the condo, looks especially good tonight. The family enters the house with smiles and shouts of laughter. Bubbie appears from the kitchen looking gorgeous with her Florida tan and a smile from ear to ear, feeling wonderful that once again the family is together.

"Hi Bubbie," scream the children.

"It's my turn to say the four questions this year."

"No it's mine," says the little one while twirling her dress with her candy-painted pinky.

Happiness and the smell of Jewish food cooked with loving care fill the room.

Mingle and schmooze for a bit and it's time to sit.

Aaron, who is 14 years old, is upset that he still has to sit at the kids' table.

"Aaron, this is not negotiable until you're 18 years old. When you're responsible enough to vote, you can sit with the adults," says Zayde as he takes his place at the head of the table.

Gentlemen, start your engines!

And the seder begins. Hands washed, wine cups filled, seder plates brimming over with the necessary trimmings, the family begins to read the Haggadah. Some in Hebrew, some in English, they take turns going around the table.

Seven children take turns saying the four questions which makes it more like the Spanish Inquisition. What they really want to know is, "When are we going to eat already?"

Cousin Jerry reads one extra paragraph and we still don't know if it was by accident or on purpose. Jason doesn't say too much since he's a little drunk from the wine and is beginning to break out in a rash.

A couple of dayenus, a discussion of hard times to remind us why we are here and then dinner is being served. Gefilte fish, chopped liver, eggplant, peppers, pickles, cole slaw, pickled salmon and that's just for starters. Soup alone or with a knadel, mandeln, matzah meal, carrots, turnips, egg noodles and dill. Chicken prepared 11 different ways. How about veal? Let's not leave out meat balls, roast tongue, and while we're at it, pass the brisket please. Diet coke, diet 7-up, regular coke, 7-up, some apple juice for Jason and seltzer for Zayde. Fruit, exotic and local, macaroons, sponge cake, pareve chocolates, apricots, jelly roll and a cup of tea. You did it again Bubbie and we love you for it.

Zayde stands up, which means it's time to find the afikoman. Bonds are low, but the children won't suffer. Any price they name they will get. You see it's not that they shouldn't know the value of things, it's just that Zayde can't say no to his grandchildren.

It's 11:20 p.m. Jason is asleep on the couch. There are still some crumbs and empty tea cups left on the table. Bubbie is in the kitchen.

Tomorrow night history repeats itself, and so it does in the fall and next April and on and on. We will always observe and never forget. Thank you Bubbie and Zayde. See you next year, God willing, same place, same table.

Passover Greetings

A Visitor at the Seder

To a simchah out-of-town my aunt did go,
The bus she took because of the heavy snow.
A horrible accident on the highway took place,
Some injured so badly you couldn't recognize their face.

My aunt survived but a terrible bang on her head she got,
She lost her memory, even her name she knew not.
With no identification and nowhere to go, her fear grew,
But the Magen David necklace she wore told her she was a Jew.

The Jewish Agency gave her an apartment and even some money,
Not knowing who you are or where you belong isn't funny.
She looked in the mirror "Who's that stranger looking at me?"
No matter what she did she couldn't jog her memory.

We mourned for my aunt as we thought she had died,
Our favorite aunt we'd see no more – we cried and cried.
We thought about her every day and every night,
Her heart and good deeds made her a shining light.

Pesach was coming, there was so much to do,
Without my dear aunt we were a pitiful crew.
The Jewish Agency called if we'd take a guest as we do every year,
We agreed – maybe a guest at our seder would bring us some cheer.

Imagine our shock and astonishment when we answered the door,
My mother screamed, turned pale, and fainted on the floor.
"She looks just like my sister," my mother said,
"Could this be her, could she be brought back from the dead?"

We asked for her name which she did not know,
She told us about the accident that happened in the snow.
We knew it was her without a doubt.
By her actions and kind words that came out of her mouth.

We sat down to the seder around a beautifully set table,
To her utmost surprise to read the Haggadah she was able.
She joined us in singing the familiar tunes and drank four cups of wine,
As the evening progressed she felt like she belonged there all the time.

We pulled out our photo album with pictures of her,
Slowly but surely her mind started to stir.
She stayed with us throughout the entire week of the Pesach holiday,
The familiar sights, sounds and smells brought back her memory day by day.

We are, thank God, once again a happy family,
All because of the mitzvah of hachnasat orchim, you see.
The moral of this whole story is clear to me,
Invite a guest to your seder, you never know who they might be.

What If...

By ALVIN ABRAM

There was fear in their eyes. There were six of them – two men, a woman, a teenager and two children. Their clothes covered their scrawny bodies but could not hide the hunger on their faces. They peered over the rubble at the high brick wall that separated them from freedom. Then they heard a truck approaching, and they tried to make themselves as small as possible to avoid detection. As the truck rumbled by, guffaws of laughter and the guttural sounds of spoken German came from the open windows.

Then silence.

A small voice said softly, "Now."

The six ran across the road to the wall and dived for the ground, praying their movements had not been detected. They weren't.

"To the tree," the small voice said.

The six crawled on their stomachs the last hundred feet to the tree beside the wall and huddled under it.

"Wait," the voice said now. She slipped behind the tree and the others heard the scraping of masonry. Then she returned, "Yankel," she said.

"Yes, Rachel?"

"Go. After you've gone, I'll seal the wall and return to the bunker."

"Are you not coming?"

"Not yet. Now, get started before the patrol returns."

There was movement and four of them disappeared behind the tree. Yankel hesitated. "How old are you, Rachel?"

"Fourteen."

"Only 14." His voice broke. "How many times have you done this?"

"I don't know."

"Why is it you don't save yourself? If you continue, you will get caught. They'll take you to the Umschlagplatz, the railway station, and you will never be seen again. Come with us. You have done enough."

"Not yet. Soon. There is no more time. Go so I can close the hole in the wall."

"Bless you, Rachel. Bless you."

"And you too," she whispered. "Remember, you must be out of Warsaw before daylight. Go east."

Yankel hurried behind the tree and made his escape. Rachel replaced the bricks, then swept the earth of any footprints. Satisfied, she peered across the road to where she had to be before the patrol returned. Quickly she crawled beside the fence to a point directly opposite her destination, noticed the headlights of the patrol truck approaching, and ran. On the other side of the road she flung herself into the ditch and froze in fear as the truck came alongside her and seemed to take forever to pass. After a few minutes, she made her way back to the sewer beneath Gesia Street.

When she reached the safety of the sewer, she breathed a sigh of relief. She smiled to herself. "Close," she muttered as she entered the bunker.

"Everything went well, I see," a young man said.

"Yes, Samuel. They're gone. I hope they make it."

"At least they have a chance. If they stayed here, they would surely have died. And you, Rachel. It's time for you to go."

"Why? I won't get caught."

"Yes, you will. You've tempted fate too often. The next trip could well be your last."

"Why?"

He made a sound of exasperation. "Look. Soon there will be no more trips, anyway. Soon the Germans will attack, and when they do, we will all die. You're too young to fight. You've done your share. The next trip, you must go."

The following Sunday, Rachel escaped from Warsaw. The next day, April 19, 1943, the Germans launched an attack on the Jewish ghetto.

There was much laughter at the table. Rachel's three children, their spouses and her grandchildren were celebrating. It was not anyone's birthday, but it was a joyous occasion – the 50th anniversary of the Warsaw uprising. The family had given Rachel a present – a trip to Israel. Rachel was a widow. Her life had been one that had brought a good deal of pride to her family and this was a way of showing their gratitude. Rachel had always wanted to go to Israel, but put it off for one reason or another. Now, widowed for several years, she had no excuse and was looking forward to the experience.

The laughter died and everyone was pleased with themselves. "So, Mother," one of her children said, "what are you going to do in Israel besides tour?"

Rachel smiled. A mischievous smile. A smile they had all seen many times before when she was about to say something funny, but this time what came out was not so much funny as preposterous. "What if … what if some of the people who I helped escape from Warsaw lived in Israel? What if … we could meet again?"

"How?" everyone said at once.

"I don't know. But wouldn't it be marvellous to see them again after all these years?"

"It's a nice idea, Mother," her son said, "but not possible. Even if there were some who did live in Israel, they would be scattered from one end to the other."

"You're right. But what if…" Rachel tilted her face upward and closed her eyes. "What if I was to put an advertisement in the Jerusalem Post and say who I was and what I had done." She opened her eyes and smiled at everyone at the table. "And told them to meet me somewhere."

Everyone laughed.

"Are you really going to do that?" one of the children asked.

"Yes."

The words were carefully composed so that those reading the ad would understand that Rachel was interested in meeting only with those she herself had helped escape from the Warsaw Ghetto. Her maiden name was shown and the dates were listed. The rendezvous would be in a restaurant that she named on Dizengoff Street in Tel Aviv on a Sunday at one in the afternoon.

The day of her departure arrived, and as she was being driven to the airport, her son asked if she expected anyone to respond.

"In case the ad was missed the first time, I put it in a second time. Do I expect a response? I don't know. Next Sunday, I'll find out."

Rachel arrived at the restaurant before one. It was about three-quarters full with Sunday lunch-goers. There were children sitting between their parents and many elderly people. Some alone, some together. All had food on the table and were talking animatedly in Hebrew. A few looked like tourists, but she couldn't be sure. She sat at a table by the far wall so she could see who entered, and waited. The waitress asked her if she wanted something, and she said not at the moment. She glanced at her wristwatch and noticed the time. It was past one.

A few times someone entered and rushed to a table and everyone became excited and laughed. Rachel smiled when someone looked at her, but her attention was on the door. She looked at her watch and realized that it was 1:30. No one had come, she thought. She tried not to show her disappointment and she stood to leave.

A young man hesitantly approached her from one of the tables. "Excuse me," he said in broken English. He seemed to be struggling for the right words.

"Yes?" Rachel said.

Glory to the Hebrew Language

(In Memory of Eliezer Ben Yehuda, the Father of Modern Hebrew Language)

A brass trumpet blasting the air
With two or three sharp notes,
A cable bound by strong coils,
A basket brimming with steel arrows —
Such is the Hebrew language.

This language,
Written with letters of fire,
Destined to pour out floods of rage
Against the world's abuses,
Calls on all four winds
Of heaven to praise life!

This language, Hebrew,
A Jubilee horn overflowing
With love and hope
Is our morning star
Whose innermost flame
Burns with justice and freedom.

"Excuse me. Is ... is your name Rachel?"

At her nod, the young man's eyes danced and he smiled the broadest smile Rachel had ever seen. Then he turned to the people in the restaurant and announced excitedly in Hebrew, "It's her! It's her! She's come!"

Everyone in the restaurant seemed to rise to their feet at the same time. They rushed to surround Rachel – the survivors, their children and their grandchildren. In English, in Hebrew, in Yiddish and in Polish, Rachel was introduced to children with her name.

A Passover Lesson

By ROBIN GLUBE

I was 7 years old the first year I participated in the search for the afikoman. For years I assumed that Jewish law put an age on the tradition. In fact, it was only after my first born was four and wanted to participate that my wife proved my ignorance to me.

In no Jewish literature to date does it state an age limit for children. Unfortunately I never had a chance to ask my parents the reason for the age restriction. In retrospect, I am certainly glad I was old enough to appreciate my whole first experience.

Normally, I would not remember such a minute detail within the vast experiences of my childhood. The tradition itself did not cause a religious awakening, nothing traumatic happened on that particular Passover, and I wasn't even the lucky kid to find the hidden matzah. Actually, not finding the afikoman is part of the significance of that particular Pesach, significance that has given me my own meaning for the holiday, and one that has been a contribution to the passionate, successful lawyer I have become.

The seder that particular year seemed especially long. The butterflies in my stomach didn't seem to fly away, even after I completed my usual high-pitched rendition of the four questions. In addition to the queasy stomach, I was just getting over one of the worst flus I can ever remember having.

Despite all my ailments, I was determined to be the finder of the afikoman that April evening. My strategy: to watch every move my grandfather would make in order to follow him to the special hiding place. But, like most 7-year-olds, I hadn't quite developed any lengthy attention span, and my plan was interrupted by an art lesson from my older cousin. She was showing me the fine art of making snowmen with my gefilte fish, toothpicks and cherry tomatoes. It must have been somewhere between Frosty's body and my grandmother's brisket that my grandfather made his move and announced that the afikoman had officially been hidden.

Alas, dessert was over and the children were dismissed from the table. That always heralded the beginning of the search. The actual hunt itself is a blur. I remember plenty of running and laughing, some shoving and pushing, and a trip to the bathroom (not for searching purposes). Within 10 minutes, the game was over, and my big cousin Avi had found the afikoman. He was 14 with the height (and mouth) of an 18-year-old. He flaunted his unleavened finding for what seemed like eternity. He began a family poll on what each member thought he should do with his new found "fortune."

Like after any other traumatic experience, I first went into shock. For weeks I had been daydreaming about the moment I would bring back the half-piece of unleavened bread to my grandfather and be awarded with the precedented shiny silver dollar. My next reaction was panic, considering that I pre-owed that dollar to my older sister. She had lent me money for some baseball cards I had bought the day earlier. Most vividly I recall feeling a sense of injustice. This was Avi's fourth year in a row winning the prize. He had so many advantages over me that I couldn't possibly have matched.

I was about ready to throw him and his stupid poll as far as my scrawny arms could manage, when my grandfather called all five of the grandchildren into the living room.

"A whole ceremony dedicated to this ego-inflated victor," I screamed in front of the entire seder table of relatives.

And with that, I crossed my hands into my chest and put on the biggest temper tantrum any parents had ever seen. I screamed out many things in those moments of temporary insanity, including a list of disadvantages I had compared to my opponents. My grandfather listened to me with a smile on his face that only made me angrier. It was obvious he was offended by immaturity and misbehavior on such a pious holiday. I knew I was in for it when he demanded I follow him into the living room immediately.

I knew my zayde meant business

As I had never heard my zayde raise his voice before, I knew he meant business. My tantrum ended just as abruptly as it had began. He sat down on his Archie Bunker-type armchair. All the grandchildren placed themselves cross-legged on the floor; all except Avi who stood tall and proud beside the armchair ready to begin his award ceremony.

The obvious ending to that Passover would have been for Avi to have boastfully accepted his reward, while I got punished for the schtick I pulled at the seder table and my sister blackmailed me for months over the dollar I owed her. But the one thing both Jewish holidays and grandfathers have in common is that they both try to make sense of adversity and trauma. It was with this last point that my grandfather began his speech.

"My dear grandchildren, it has been brought to my attention by the little barrister among us that hiding the afikoman inside the top of the curtain put some of you at a disadvantage. Avi and Sara have a height advantage over Solomon, Joey and Natalie. A home turf advantage could also go to Avi and Natalie considering they live here and are more familiar with the hiding places in the house.

"I also realize that I should have made the hunt stop while Joey was off in the washroom. This gave the rest of you extra time.

"Lastly, Sara and Solomon are not wearing their glasses tonight, and where I placed the matzah made it almost impossible for them to see it.

"It seems a shame that the hunt tonight turned out to be so unjust. Do you realize that matzah itself is a symbol of justice? It has become a symbol of liberty and a reminder of the unleavened bread which the Israelites prepared in such haste when they fled from Pharaoh in Egypt. Passover itself is a symbol for little boys and girls, even for grownups and grandparents, of their own search for freedom. Remember, our flight from Pharaoh reminds us that we can break any chain of discrimination which keeps us in bondage.

"But tonight a special little boy reminded me that discrimination is always taking place and that we have to continually fight against what we know in our hearts to be unfair.

"Now children, I hope you have understood what your crazy old zayde has told you. I cannot give the reward only to Avi tonight. I think we are all winners because of what we have been taught by one of your cousins. I will give each of you one quarter. Thank Joey for this gift. Thank him for both gifts."

Twenty-eight years later I can still feel the pride I felt after my grandfather's memorable speech. It is funny which experiences from childhood profoundly affect one's path in life. As a lawyer, I am constantly pleading discrimination and injustice cases. I fight for freedom on a daily basis. But this has not stopped me from taking every Passover holiday to remember why such a passion can never die.

Spirit Flame

Yahrzeit lamp. Memorial. Ner neshamah.
I call it — Spirit Flame, lit every year on the anniversary of a dear one's death.
To call them up to talk to them to weep, missing them.

After my brother Lawrie died,
he came to my farm in a dream.
He never came there in life,
our paths too divergent.

He sat in my kitchen,
on the counter, chatting,
reassuring me he was okay, convincing me
he'd just gone out one door, but he'd be back through another.

On Lawrie's birthday, ten years later,
our sister, Lynni,
had a male child.

Lawrie's spirit casts light far beyond the yearly flame.

The Narrow Escape

By MUGUETTE MYERS

I was born in Paris. As Jews during World War II, we were hidden – my mother, my brother and I – in a little village in Burgundy, 150 kilometres southeast of the French capital. My mother occasionally had to go to Paris for a day and she took the bus that went through the village and straight on to the city. On this particular day, as she prepared to board the bus, her heart sank. To her misfortune Mr. Gaston Ravère, the village drunk, was also boarding the bus.

When sober, he was a harmless soul who wouldn't hurt a fly, a gentle, quiet person. However, when he was drunk (which was most of the time) he staggered about the village singing guardhouse songs at the top of his lungs and talking nonsense to whoever he met. Since he was so loud when inebriated, everyone tried to stay out of his way.

That day, when he saw Maman on the bus, he zigzagged over and sat heavily down next to her, almost landing on the floor in the process. Maman tried to ignore him, but he would have none of that. For once, he had a captive audience and he was going to make the most of it.

He started innocently enough, by recalling at length the story of his life. Then he looked around the bus and noticed several German soldiers: "Regardez-moi ça (look at this)!" he said to my mother "Y'a des Boches partout (there are Huns everywhere)!"

Maman tried not to listen to him, but he kept poking at her to get her attention. Then he was silent for a few kilometres and she thought he had fallen asleep. How wrong she was! Suddenly he stirred, narrowed his eyes to tiny slits and bellowed: "N'ayez pas peur Madame Bella (don't be afraid), personne ne vous fera du mal tant que je serai là (no one will hurt you as long as I am here)! Moi aussi je suis Juif (I am also a Jew)!" – That wasn't true of course; he was a Catholic, but he believed he was speaking out of solidarity with my mother.

Maman thought she was going to faint. Thank God most of the people on the bus were dozing, and either those who were awake didn't pay much attention to a drunk, or they chose to ignore his ranting.

After this outbreak, Maman pretended to sleep the rest of the way and arrived safely at her destination. Afterward whenever she had to go to Paris (which fortunately wasn't often) she made sure that Gaston Ravère was nowhere in sight.

HANNAH SENESH

A soul of infinite beauty and such a savage ending.
How many souls? So many that Your treasury was empty.
One night Israel danced with the Eternal. The moon was as full as it would ever be. You did not see them at the border of the trees.
She professed not to believe.
But Your Presence inhabited her Being. You were caught with her in a great welt of blood beneath her skin.
And yet You loomed
knowing You would find another one as innocent to bear Your Name.

KOHELET

He was a witness to the city.
He sat in the assembly and he watched the dissemblers.
And in the gathering place of God, they conspired to divide the world
between them.
He smiled and laughed with them, and his thoughts were concealed. And his silence did no honor to his Lord.
And he marvelled at the fire that burns in the souls of prophets.
Words coiled in him
with the venom of serpents.
Dreams sprang up like tangled gardens.
Tempests filled the nests, of mountains, and he knew he had been given strength.
But the spirit of Heaven
did not descend to him.
And he could not find a way to break the bonds of fear. And the Lord mocked him with signs and visions. And he sat at the table of sinners and he drank the wine of fools.

BROKEN VESSEL

Why did Jonah beg to die when Nineveh repented?
His mind could not contain the idea of the Lord.
He lay on his bed
like a drowning man.
He would not eat.
He could not sleep.
While the city reverted
as he knew it would.
The reason that he hid from God. Is there a plan, he asked himself? Or,
random stories I compose.
For a prophet there's no part.
But the Lord pursued him anyway. I chose you to make my Name
a living thing
among the peoples of the earth. A summer's day. A gentle rain.

Wanted: Vibrant Young Rabbi

By RUTH STERN WARZECHA

Wanted: Vibrant Young Rabbi

Established progressive/traditional congregation of 200 families looking for new rabbi. Demonstrated leadership abilities, counselling and youth group experience an asset. Smichah from recognized yeshiva program a must. To begin at earliest convenience. Four bedroom house, generous benefits package and country club membership included. Please send resume before March 4 to:

The Search Committee
Julius Katzenkopf, President
Congregation Goshen
Mariposa, Ontario
X0X 0X0

Only finalists will be contacted for interviews.

Two weeks before Passover, the search committee of Congregation Goshen of Mariposa interviewed the third of four candidates in the synagogue's boardroom. Present were Mr. Julius Katzenkopf, president of the synagogue, Yossi Johnston, the shul's biggest philanthropist and Sam Groszkortz, the shammas.

As the applicant entered the room, Katzenkopf was scanning the resume and was impressed with this applicant's excellent credentials. Then he looked up at the man and frowned at what he saw. Although the applicant had an imposing bearing, Katzenkopf was disappointed at his wardrobe. The young rabbi was wearing dusty old sandals over socks and a suit in need of dry-cleaning. Julius Katzenkopf did not approve of slovenliness even if the resume was excellent.

Groszkortz made the introductions and began to speak. "Please be seated, Rabbi Rabein. Am I pronouncing it right?"

The young man sat down, took off his hat and put it on his lap. Katzenkopf immediately noticed the rabbi's handsome face had a definite glow of health. He even looked a little like a younger Charlton Heston.

"I pronounce it Ra-bane with the emphasis on the second syllable," the application said, "but it's not my original last name."

Johnston asked, "Your family changed it?"

Katzenkopf was sure he noticed a slight lisp in the rabbi's voice. Public speaking was a crucial part of a congregational rabbi's job and a lisp was another black mark against this unpromising applicant.

The young man began to fidget with his hat. "Well, I never really knew my parents much after the age of six. I was raised in a foster home." His lisp seemed to get worse with his nervousness.

"That's terrible," Katzenkopf commiserated. But he was really thinking that there was probably some scandal in the rabbi's background – another black mark. Obviously, this rabbi's chances of landing the plum position of Goshen's rabbi were getting slimmer with every comment he made.

The young man added quickly: "It wasn't really my parents' fault. Times were tough. They decided to split up and then they got back together. But they couldn't keep me, even though they really wanted to.

"My foster home was pretty decent, though. My foster mother Betty is a WASP blueblood, but she loved me as if I were her own. She paid for speech therapy; you may have noticed that I have a slight lisp, and she made sure I got into Princeton. But after I graduated, I decided to explore my roots and enrolled in yeshiva. That's in my resume along with the kiruv work I've been doing, bringing other Jews back."

After checking the list of yeshivot and social service agencies on the second page of the resume, Katzenkopf looked at the top of the first page. "You give your address as 226 Levi Lane. Isn't that Aaron Cohen's address?"

The young rabbi answered. "Aaron is my brother, my biological brother. I found him on the Internet recently after I decided to contact my family. While I'm job hunting, my wife and I are staying with him."

"Who's Aaron Cohen?" Johnston asked.

"Yossi, you know him," said Katzenkopf. "Aaron Cohen. He comes to the brotherhood minyan on Sunday mornings. He's a labor negotiator. He ended that strike at the auto plant last month."

"Oh yeah! Ron Cohen. Sure, I know him," said Johnston.

Katzenkopf was surprised and impressed by the family connection. Aaron Cohen was a respected member of the congregation and the community. If this Moshe Rabein was a brother of his, even a long-lost brother, you couldn't write him off as rabbi material, yet. For the first time, Katzenkopf smiled at the applicant.

"Wait a minute," exclaimed Groszkortz, the shammas. "If Ron Cohen is your brother, then Dr. Miri Kolev the obstetrician must be your sister."

The young rabbi smiled. "Yes, Miri is my big sister. She tried to keep track of me after I had to leave home. But of course, I don't remember. Anyway, since both my brother and sister live here in Mariposa and are members of Goshen shul, they encouraged me to try for this pulpit position."

"Well, you seem to be on good terms with both of them after such a long separation," said Katzenkopf.

The young rabbi stroked his hat brim, thoughtfully. "To be perfectly honest, Mr. Katzenkopf, things would be ideal if my brother and sister would completely accept my wife, Tzippy."

"And why don't they accept her, Rabbi Rabein?" asked Katzenkopf.

"I want to be perfectly upfront with this committee. You should know from the beginning that my wife Tzippy is a convert. Her father used to be a Unitarian minister. But lately, he and I have had long talks about Jewish philosophy. And he just started taking classes at a Lubavitch community centre. But that doesn't really answer your question. Unfortunately, both Ron and Miri have a hard time accepting a convert as a newly found sister-in-law. But they're trying their best, and I'm sure in time, they'll come to love her."

The rabbi paused and continued, "I also know, gentlemen, that some shuls wouldn't hire a rabbi like me, one who was raised as a non-Jew or one who's married to a convert. I had no intention of trying out for this job when I first heard about it, but my brother Ron assured me that your congregation is different. He said you accept people for what they are, not where they come from. He said your synagogue is a friendly, accepting place so I decided to apply."

Despite his misgivings, Katzenkopf was impressed by Rabbi Rabein's candor. He continued reading from the resume. "It says here you used to be a sheepherder and a magician."

"Well, sheepherding was only a summer job and I worked as a magician at kids' birthday parties to help pay my way through university. I didn't want to be a burden to my stepmother after all she did for me. I think I still remember a few magic tricks. Want to see me turn my umbrella into a snake?" He pulled a collapsible umbrella out of his briefcase.

"No, no, it's okay," said Katzenkopf. "I'm sure your magic tricks would go over quite well with our youth groups; but what I'm really interested in, Rabbi Rabein, is knowing your long-term goals."

Katzenkopf scanned the papers in front of him. "Your resume is unfocused. You seem to have wandered around with no direction in your career. Even though your character and professional references speak glowingly of your leadership qualities and breadth of scholarship. I somehow don't get the feeling that we could count on you to stay with us, permanently. If we were to hire you, Rabbi Rabein – Do you mine if I call you Moshe? – how can we be certain that you won't wander off after a few years?"

Rabein looked Katzenkopf straight in the eyes. "Mr. Katzenkopf and gentlemen, I can't deny that my upbringing has been unusual, not typical for a community leader's, but I see it as a plus in the work I've dedicated myself to and I want you to know that if you decide to hire me, I would do my utmost to help bring the congregation and indeed the entire Jewish community closer to God. This I believe is my purpose in life. But what I cannot promise you, gentlemen, is a long-term commitment. I've talked with my wife and we decided that eventually, we would like to make aliyah and live in Israel."

The passion in the rabbi's voice impressed Julius Katzenkopf. Such idealism reminded him of his own youthful dreams, but he cleared his throat and said, "Young man, your love of Israel is admirable and all that, but not suitable for our needs. Your commitment should first be to your congregation. Our mandate is to find a rabbi who will stay as our spiritual leader for a long time. Rabbi Josephson, of blessed memory, was our rabbi for 40 years. We do need some young blood, and I admire your natural leadership qualities and your honesty. I will also say your being Ron and Miri's brother reflects very well on your chances.

"If you could see fit to change your mind about this impractical attachment to Israel, I think there is a distinct possibility that we might consider hiring you. Do you agree with me, gentlemen?"

Both Johnston and Groszkortz nodded in agreement.

"Katzenkopf continued. "Well, Rabbi Moshe Rabein... nu, what do you say to that?"

The young man slowly stood up, put his hat back on and said, "I'm not sure, Mr. Katzenkopf. It's a very tempting offer. Perhaps I could get back to you with a definite answer after I talk it over with my spiritual advisor?"

Sam Groszkortz spoke up. "And who is your spiritual advisor, Rabbi?"

Moshe Rabein smiled benevolently. "The Almighty, blessed be His Name, is my spiritual advisor."

The Congregation Goshen personnel committee gazed at him in silence.

Rabbi Rabein extended his hand in turn to each committee member. "Thank you. It's been a sincere pleasure meeting each of you."

The three men uttered brief goodbyes and Sam Groszkortz saw the Rabbi out.

After the door closed behind them, Katzenkopf fell back into his chair and exclaimed to Johnston, "My God, that's all the shul needs, a religious fanatic for a rabbi!"

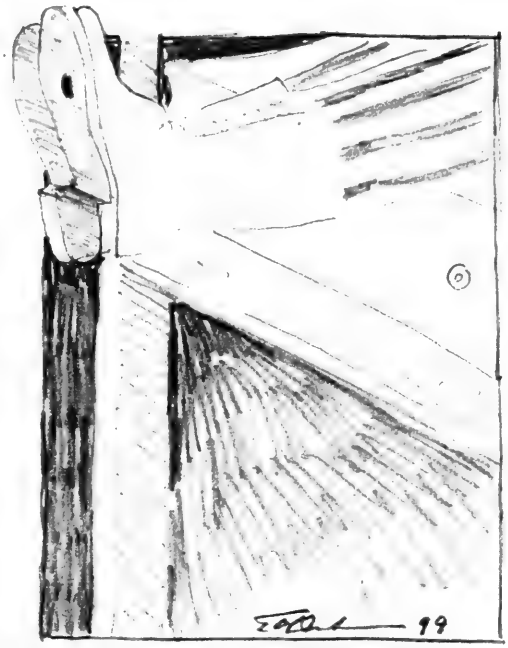
The Inspection

By JOSEPH PERETZ



More than a year has elapsed since we arrived in this wooded area of the French Ardennes, south of the Belgian border. The year was 1943. By now, we were used to life in the forced labor camp.

My service in the Belgian army a few years earlier made it easier to adapt to the rigors of camp life. A good sense of humor also helped. One evening, during rollcall, while the soft autumn breeze played with the yellow golden leaves of the birch trees outside the barbed wire surrounding the camp, we were given the news.

The Lagerführer (commandant), dressed in his khaki uniform with a red, white and black swastika armband and black polished boots, told us about the impending inspection and ordered a thorough clean-up of the barrack.

He informed us that the Oberstandarteanführer, coming straight from Berlin, will honor his camp with an inspection. Very proudly, he added that this officer was a personal friend of der Führer; and was recently decorated by him with the iron cross with swords and diamonds, obviously one of the most coveted awards.

This last bit of information did nothing to allay our fear. A sense of foreboding took hold of us. What harsh treatment would ensue from this inspection? What changes could we look forward to?

We scrubbed and cleaned for hours. It was a clear, moonlit night. My scary thoughts were interrupted by the monotonous droning of high-flying aircraft. My prayers and gratitude went out to those brave Allies who were getting even with those responsible for our predicament.

The door of the barrack flung open

Despite the apprehension and the rumbling in my hungry stomach, my curiosity was aroused. I could not wait to see this famous individual whose imminent arrival set the entire camp command abuzz.

Finally, the moment has come. The door of the barrack flung open. The guard in his green uniform with black and silver SS insignia on his collar, steel helmet deep over his eyes, yelled "Achtung." All 40 of us jumped up and stood at attention in front of our bunk-beds.

The inspector has arrived: The guard stood aside to give way to our illustrious visitor, accompanied by the camp commandant.

The bluish-gray overcoat covered his rather short body, down to his highly polished boots. He seemed to have no neck, reducing his stature even further. His large hook nose complemented the long visor of his alpine style cap. A leather belt and shiny brown holster completed his martial regalia.

As he strutted past us, his cold steel-grey piercing eyes looked through us as if we were invisible. The fragrance of his after-shave lotion blended with the scent of the freshly scoured wood of the plank floor.

After glancing around the barrack, he stopped and in a loud voice proclaimed: "I gather that you are all treated well" and asked if we had any complaints.

The irony of his question struck me. My eternal sense of humor got the better of me. I raised my hand.

He looked at me with a stunned expression, then lowered his eyes to the obligatory yellow Star of David pinned to my chest.

With a derisive sneer, he barked: "Was ist denn los?" Loosely translated: "What is your problem?" "Herr Oberstandauternführer" I said, addressing him in German by his full rank "Mein Bett ist zu kurz." (My bed is too short.)

Our camp commandant, standing beside him in his best dress uniform, shocked by my audacity, his face crimson, his eyes bulging with rage, stared at me with looks that could kill.

The silence following my complaint was deafening. The tension was palpable as all eyes in the barrack were focused on me.

After a few seconds, which seemed like hours, the inspector ordered me to lie down on my bed.

I hoisted myself to the upper bunk, where I slept for the past year and stretched out to the full length of my over-six-foot body, my legs protruding a few inches over the foot board. I became painfully aware of the now exposed hole in the sole of my worn-out workboots. My heart was pounding. All kinds of horrible thoughts ran through my head. Maybe this time I had gone too far. Would he pull out his Luger and shoot me in front of everybody? I did not want to die. Not yet.

Slowly he looked up at me. Our eyes met. He cleared his throat and stated:

"Das Bett ist nicht zu kurz, der Jude ist zu lang" (The bed is not too short, the Jew is too tall).

He suddenly burst out laughing at his own joke. The tension broke and a relieved lagerführer jöined in the laughter.

Even the SS guard was grinning as he opened the door for their exit.

Passover Greetings

The Pledge to the Maharal

By VERA SCHIFF

Herta and Olga were inseparable friends. Both were born into families who had a taste for the refined things of this world and the ample means to afford them.

Herta was an only child. Olga had a brother 10 years her senior, so that she too grew up alone, the centre of her parents' affection.

Both sets of parents doted on their daughters, and considered only the best good enough for them.

Both girls were born in 1927, during the heyday of the Jews of Czechoslovakia. They lived in close proximity to each other, in one of the most exclusive residential districts of Prague. Their early years were filled with visits to theatres, operas, ballets, summer vacations at the Adriatic Sea and winter holidays in the mountains.

Their friendship was the cornerstone of their lives.

Their parents practised a reformed version of the Jewish faith, but they still insisted that the girls be versed in Jewish religion and history. That is how they came to know the saga of the Great Rabbi Loew of Prague (the Maharal) and the golem.

Herta and Olga were fascinated with the mystic story. They extracted a promise from their teacher to take them to the tomb of the great Maharal, who is buried in the ancient cemetery of Prague, long closed for it is overcrowded. The tombstones heave; some have toppled. Still, the resting place of the Maharal is separate, distinguishable by a marble tombstone as befits the burial vault of a great leader, teacher and benefactor of his flock.

The girls would return to the cemetery and try to envision the Jewish world of Prague of long ago. In their imagination, they visualized the great Maharal, the golem, and life in the embattled ghetto. Neither girl understood why they felt so intrigued by the old cemetery and the myth of golem.

Both girls turned 12 years of age in 1939. For their birthday, the girls each received a gold chain with a pendant of the Star of David. They had wished for identical ones but Herta's was somewhat larger and differently engraved than Olga's. The joy of receiving their necklaces was short-lived.

Once again, the Jews of Prague were threatened, only there was no leader of the stature of Maharal. The year 1939 also marked the Nazi invasion of their homeland. The persecution of the Jews began almost immediately. One of the early orders required the Jews to turn in all their gold and valuables. The adults quickly collected all they had and delivered it to the authorities. The parents forgot about the necklaces, but in any event, the two had agreed to refuse to part with them. They hid them deep in the back of the drawers of their desks under a pile of notebooks.

Soon the deportations of the Jews of Prague began. Only Herta's brother Frank fled to England. Shortly before the spring of 1942, when all signs pointed to an impending removal of the Jews from Prague, the two girls decided to seek a magical rescue of their own.

Each girl wrapped her Star of David meticulously in a page torn from a prayer book and sealed the pages with glue. They then set out for the old Jewish cemetery, where they went straight to the grave of the Maharal, said a fast prayer, beseeching the great rabbi for his help on their journey into the unknown.

They begged for their own invisible golem, who would bravely defend and protect them. They had to be brief, because the curfew affecting Jews of Prague forced them to be home before dark.

The girls wanted to leave a token of their respect and devotion at the grave of Maharal and buried their Stars of David at the foot of the tomb. Herta on the right side, Olga on the left. They dug deep holes, and then placed the well-wrapped stars in them. They covered the site carefully and pledged to the Maharal to uphold the Jewish faith, asking for his blessings for the arduous journey that lay ahead of them. They promised each other to meet at the tomb if and when they returned from what awaited them.

From here, each went her separate way. Olga went to Auschwitz, to Bergen-Belsen, where she contracted typhus and died. Herta was deported to Theresienstadt, then to Auschwitz and ultimately to the labor camp of Ravensbrueck. She was liberated there, half dead, by the Allied armies and sent to Sweden to recover. Eventually, almost restored to life, she returned to Prague.

Upon her return to Prague, Herta, the sole survivor of her family, could not visit the grave of the Maharal. But one day she plucked up her courage and decided to retrieve the memento she had left in the cemetery.

As if God-sent, Herta received a call from Olga's brother Frank, a soldier in the Allied forces, who had also returned to his homeland. Herta was happy not to have to visit the mysterious cemetery on her own. She confided her little secret to Frank, who smiled between tears. He already knew that his family had perished.

Passover Greetings

Passover Prayer

The blood of the sheep no longer decorates the doors of the chosen
And the blood shall be to you for a token upon the houses where you are
As we pass the matzah and the bitter herbs
And when I see the blood, I will pass over you
And the youngest stands and recites the Ma nishtanah
And the plague shall not be upon you to destroy you
And mother passes the charoset to father and then to mother and then to father
When I smite the land of Egypt.

As evening spreads its blanket of gray across the sky
Seven days shall ye eat unleavened bread
And family by family arranges itself around a table
And ye shall keep it a feast to the Lord throughout your generations
And hands are washed and prayers are said
I have brought your armies out of the land of Egypt.
And wine is blessed and wine is tasted and drops are spilled
And the children of Israel did according to the word of Moses.

As songs rise up beyond the rooftops
I will sing unto the Lord for he hath triumphed gloriously
And voices are heard beyond the walls
But the children of Israel walked upon dry land in the midst of the sea
No longer will pharaohs, whether old or new, keep us silent
And the people feared the Lord, and believed the Lord, and his servant Moses
For now we are strong and the seder is all.

They opened the parchment

When they reached the grave, Herta set about to dig up the pendant she and Olga had buried four years earlier as amulets, pawns for their safe return. Following a long search, they found a wet parchment on the left side. All excited, they opened it.

Inside was the Star of David, the way Olga had parted with it. Herta's pendant was not there. No matter how long they dug, it was not to be found.

One year later, Herta and Frank married. They left Europe and settled in Australia, there they raised a daughter and a son. The girl was named Olga, in honor of the other little girl who had placed her faith in the magic powers of the Maharal.

When little Olga reached her 12th birthday, her parents gave her a special gift: the Star of David that had been destined to protect her aunt.

In spite of their wealth, Herta and Frank considered the Star of David, hidden and then retrieved from the gravesite of the Maharal their greatest asset.

Irving and Leonard in the Back Seat of the Car

I saw the clip of Layton and Cohen, as they were, a younger man and a young man, filmed on a Montreal winter day by the National Film Board of Canada going into the back seat of a large black sedan, smoking cigars and looking like they just had a steak and a drink.
Later they'd get laid, write a poem about it and correct history.
Those were good days when there was a country that needed a film board, and more than a few poets on the payroll.
Verse, industry and peacekeeping would steel and refine the soul of the nation and a good part of the world.
If a poet writes, "Let there be light," there will be light.
These weren't Brando and Steiger in the back seat.
Layton and Cohen, were both contenders.

I wanted to be them.
Suzanne, or more realistically her younger sister, would also take me down to the river.
For my brother Irving, I'd resurrect the six million.

Of course, I also wanted to be Bobby "poet of the ice" Orr.

This Photograph

This photograph is gathering dust.
There is a Jew acknowledging his god's dominion.

Wearing tallit and tfillin
He is hunched over in his final prayer and humility.
There is a Nazi.
He laughs with the lust and vulgarity of healthy young men who do not fear retribution.
The background is lined with victims to be,
Who for the moment reflect the letting of blood of this child of the covenant.

Curse the Jew with laughter.
Kill the Jew. But curse the Jew.
The bearer of the twisted cross curses the god of the Jews,
God to this Jew.
This Jew did not die fearing evil men,
But while making his god holy.
Wipe the dust away, reflect what laughter does not hide.

By Andrew Fainer

Let's Look At That Photograph Again

Although I never knew this brother Jew, I had assumed he was eternal because God was Eternal and Almighty, in spite of the obvious.
I imagined him learned, pious, heroic, the declaration of God's oneness and sovereignty on his lips, never thinking himself forsaken.
His blood sacrifice promised redemption.
I imagined myself to be that Jew, and went to learn the scripture and the practices.

However now that some Canadian soldiers have taken their own pictures in black Somalia, I realize the photograph was a war trophy and I'm much less certain as to what I saw.
Having been haunted into religious impersonation, and now unlikely to join Islam, I have to look again at that first picture.
I see now only that they were men in Nazi uniform.
They laughed while the man on his knees wrapped in phylacteries and draped in prayer cloth waited to be murdered by them.
They were not at all unhappy to have this moment of natural supremacist glory captured in a photograph by a brother Nazi.

Chassid, Mitnagid, Maskil, Socialist, Zionists ... Simple Jew, Brother Jew could have been any Jew, and condemned by the Third Reich to destruction, he could have been a part Jew, a past Jew.
The tallis and tfillin might have not been his.
Down on the ground encircled by mocking murderers and helplessly doomed family, his eyes if opened could only look up to Heaven.
He did not pose for a picture. He was posed.

The hearty young soldiers asked no questions of the Jewish props of cloth and leather and voice of prayer.

Saying No to Hollywood

Amazing. My friend Issie said no to Spielberg, no to bloody Hollywood.
The casting call went out to all with a 50-year-old tattoo.
Planned distribution is limited to holocaust museums, but you never know – Issie is a handsome man, it could be a big break.

Maybe not.

After Schindler's List a lawyer informed Spielberg that Justice requires testimony free from hearsay.

So a small volunteer Jewish army have filmed interviews with 38,000 survivors,
one person-universe at a time,
before their time runs out.
A gray Jewish head talks and a couple of younger Jewish heads listen and roll film.
38,000 times, so far.
Roughly 26 years of 24 hours a day of film that's now being indexed and catalogued.

Near the end of this bloody century, the Swiss have been forced to disclose the numbers and names of 15,000 accounts dormant since 1945.

Aged war monsters are being placed on trial for their Western citizenships.
Even the French have begun to place on trial skeletons who still have flesh on them.
Small justice, late justice, Small justice, last justice, is still some justice.

But Issie refuses to be in the movies, even at the request of kin much closer than Spielberg who break bread, share his life and his house and are touched by his soul.
They wish for him to speak and heal.

The children know only the names of his dead.
What they would do to bring them back.
But, they can only bring new life to life.

And in his arms, with the faded numbers never intentionally hidden by long sleeves, he cradles the children's children as if they held the light of God's presence,
And that he is in Paradise.

A Cecil Roth Centenary

By RABBI SHLOMO JAKOBOVITS

More books on Jewish history have been written in the 20th century than in all previous centuries combined. And the historian who produced the most is Cecil Roth.

Roth was born March 5, 1899, in London, England. His father was a businessman who was well-versed in Jewish matters. With the help of hired tutors, he imparted to his children a thorough knowledge of Hebrew, and nurtured them in the observance of Orthodox Judaism.

By the time Cecil Roth turned 18, World War I had raged for three years, and in England every male of that age was pressed into military service. Roth was hardly the military type, but he was nevertheless drafted and sent to the battlefront in the Flanders section of Belgium – the war theatre which later became immortalized as Flanders Fields.

Throughout his army service, he kept a small Chumash in his pocket. His colleagues, Jewish and non-Jewish, looked to him for religious guidance, and sometimes also for directional guidance. During a particularly ferocious German counter-attack, the order was given to withdraw quickly. As the British column retreated along a winding road, Roth confided to his commanding officer that in his opinion, they were marching towards the enemy, perhaps to death, not away from it. His alarm was passed up the chain of command, and fortunately, the order came down to reverse direction immediately.

After the Allied victory, Roth entered Oxford University, where his field was general history, with specialization in Italian studies. He mastered the Italian language and excelled in Italian history and art. In due course, he also became fully conversant with Hebrew, Spanish, Ladino and French, and also attained a working knowledge of classical Greek and Latin. In those years, the universities did not yet recognize Yiddish as a full-fledged language; so it did not become part of his repertoire.

Roth's first scholarly article was published in 1921 when he was a second year undergraduate. Its title, The Jews of Florence signalled his two special fields of future interest – Jewish history and Italy – and for the moment, Italy was in the forefront.

Just one year after the appearance of this article Mussolini marched on Rome and became dictator of Italy. Jews disliked fascism, and for Roth, who so admired Italy, this was a disheartening and frightening development. However, at first, Mussolini was on the whole, a benevolent dictator. Ten years later, when the Nazis came to power in Germany, Mussolini's disdain for Hitler enhanced his standing among Jews.

So Roth continued his Italian studies. His doctoral thesis, published in 1925, was called The Last Florentine Republic; the work immediately earned accolades and awards in Italy and an invitation to lecture in the United States.

Roth visited Italy frequently, at times living there for an entire year. In 1930, he published his History of the Jews in Venice, for which the city of Venice duly honored him.

In 1934, Hitler engineered the assassination of Engelbert Dollfuss, chancellor of Austria, as a prelude to taking over Austria. Thereupon Mussolini warned Hitler that if the Nazis marched into Austria, Italy would fight them. To reinforce his threat, Mussolini assembled an army of 50,000 at the Austrian border. Hitler, not yet ready for war, backed away, and Austria was saved, for the moment. Thus it turned out that throughout those pre-war years, fascist Italy was the only power which stood up against German expansionism.

Two years later, a similar German threat was directed westward. In violation of the Versailles Treaty, Hitler threatened to march into the Rhineland, which bordered on France and Belgium. Unlike Italy in 1934, France and Britain did nothing and Germany reconquered the Rhineland without a shot.

Mussolini was appalled at this Allied weakness, and thereupon he swung to the German side. In 1938 when Austria again became the target of Germany, and then Czechoslovakia, Italy was on Germany's side. The Fascists even instituted in Italy a great deal of anti-Jewish legislation adopted from Nazi Germany.

At this point, Roth spoke out. He repudiated all Italian honors he had attained over the years, cancelled his membership in Italian learned societies, and returned his Italian medals. He kept only the artifacts he himself had purchased. Among these was one item of particular interest – a set of keys which, in the Middle Ages, had belonged to the city of Florence and was used to lock and unlock the city gates. The keys had mysteriously disappeared and for centuries were thought to be lost. They suddenly turned up in 1934 on Sotheby's auction block, almost unnoticed by the major bidders. Roth gleefully bought the set, and then let it be known that he would one day present them to the mayor of Florence.

Word of all this somehow reached Winston Churchill. In 1944, after Italy had joined the Allied side against Germany, the British prime minister planned an official visit to Italy. He contacted Roth to ask whether he, Churchill, could be the bearer of these keys and present them to Florence. Roth respectfully declined, insisting the time was not yet ripe for such an act of goodwill; they were still too close to the era of Italy's collaboration with Nazi Germany. It was a rare thing for someone to say no to Churchill.

The keys remained in the Roth collection for over 45 more years, before their final presentation to Florence. During this period, they were on public display several times at the Cecil Roth Museum in Toronto.

After the war, when the Italians had disowned Mussolini, they took the initiative and returned to Roth the membership and medals he had repudiated in 1938. More Italian honors were subsequently conferred upon him, including the President's Order of Merit, the highest award in Italy.

Even during the period when Roth's focus was on Italy, he devoted substantial time to Jewish subjects. Already in his student years, he published a translation of Tisha b'Av Kinot, and this work was adopted as a textbook in certain university courses.

The topic of Marranos also interested Roth immensely throughout his career. He travelled to Spain, Portugal, Holland and other countries to pursue research in this field, and in 1931, he produced his monumental work, A History of the Marranos. This book revealed an abundance of hitherto unknown historical data, and it profoundly influenced future scholars. It even had an impact on the life of the writer himself. From then on, Roth became primarily a Jewish historian, and he henceforth directed the bulk of his energy to Jewish subjects.

At one and the same time the book manifests the details of his factual research as well as the heated emotions generated by the awe-inspiring phenomenon it relates. The cruelty of the "holy" Inquisition is incredible, and the steadfastness of the Jews against whom it was directed is even more incredible. Tens, perhaps hundreds of thousands of Jews tenaciously maintained their Judaism in secret, generation after generation, without synagogues or schools or suppliers of kosher food or Jewish books, and always at risk of torture and death upon discovery. The Jews who ultimately managed to escape, immediately established congregations in their cities of refuge – Amsterdam, Hamburg, Antwerp, London, Salonika, New York, and many more.

In the book, Roth finds instances of underground Jews in other times and other places, but he leaves no doubt that the magnitude of the marvel in Iberia has no parallel in Jewish history, nor in any other history. He published a further work on the subject in 1937, called The Spanish Inquisition.

Books and monographs flowed from Roth's pen in a constant stream, and many of them have been translated into several languages. One tally lists over 600 titles. And behind each printed chapter lies a wealth of painstaking research. There is hardly a page which does not reveal some hitherto unknown fact or occurrence.

Some historians concentrate on discerning trends or finding causes. Roth, though cognizant of the broader developments, focused his energy on specific names and happenings. He described himself as a detective, digging deep for the evidence, and then sorting out the many pieces to ascertain in full detail what actually had happened in each particular episode of history. When asked why he devoted himself to this laborious task, he responded, "Because it is such fun."

Some felt he was aloof

Roth's mastery of English was outstanding, his choice of words impeccable; however, the reader would indeed be well advised to keep a dictionary at hand, for many terms are used which are beyond the vocabulary of average individuals.

This elevated level of language was an irritant to some of the audiences before whom he lectured. There were those among his listeners who felt that he was aloof and distant, and this was reinforced by his unusual hairstyle and his eccentric mannerisms. Nevertheless, he was in high demand as a speaker, and he addressed numerous audiences throughout the lands of western civilization. His sophisticated sense of humor always added a subtle flavor to his lectures. He repeatedly complained of the low fees paid to lecturers – sometimes no fee at all, only expenses, and sometimes not even that. Once, when asked on what he would speak that evening, he responded, "On an empty stomach."

Roth's writings show an unusual degree of diversity. Some of his works cover broad topics, such as A Short History of the Jewish People, and The Jewish Contribution to Civilization. Both of these, though published during the Depression, proved to be best-sellers. Other works focus on narrower fields, such as his History of the Jews in England, History of the Jews in Italy, History of Jewish Art, and Personalities and Events in Jewish History. Still others concentrate on the history of Jews in specific cities, such as Oxford and Verona, or specific eras, such as Medieval England and the Renaissance. Several works deal with individuals or individual families. Among such titles are Menasseh Ben Israel, Duke of Nazos, Benjamin Disraeli, Gracia Nasi, The Rothschilds, The Sassoons. Some works were commissioned by specific organizations; among these are History of the Jewish Chronicle (of London), and History of the Great Synagogue (of London).

His Jewish Book of Days chronicles the events of the past 17 centuries according to the days of the calendar on which they occurred. Roth produced the Soncino Haggadah, was editor-in-chief of the Standard Jewish Encyclopedia and of the 16-volume Encyclopedia Judaica, and published articles in Encyclopedia Britannica, in Cambridge Medieval History and in other such multi-volume works.

Where there was intellectual controversy he waded into it enthusiastically. After the discovery of the Dead Sea Scrolls, he wrote a historical study on the subject. From the evidence, he drew the conclusion that the writers of these scrolls were the Zealots, a militant sect who subsequently generated the disastrous rebellion against Rome. Nearly all other scholars attributed these writings to the Essenes, a totally different group, very passive and peaceful. Six years later, during the excavation of Masada, Yigal Yadin unearthed new evidence which totally vindicated Roth's position and forced his opponents to concede.

Roth records history as an impartial chronicler, in keeping with the discipline of high-level scholarship. Yet his commitment to Judaism and to belief in Divine Providence comes through repeatedly.

Most historians see the unfolding chain of human events as a series of causes and effects. Roth rejects this secular analysis. In his History of the Jewish People, he emphatically states that no rational explanation can suffice to account for the unique panorama of the Jewish experience. In one of the most eloquent arguments found in English literature for belief in God, Roth offers history itself as the convincing evidence. Also, he repeatedly emphasizes the role of observance as the key to Jewish survival.

With Hitler's rise to power in the 1930s the infamous blood libel of Medieval days claiming that Jews participated in ritual murders made its odious comeback. The Nazi, Julius Streicher, promulgated this slander in Germany, and echoes were then heard elsewhere. In 1759, Pope Benedict XIV had requested that a study be conducted to establish whether the blood accusation bore any validity. A cardinal was entrusted with the task, and he prepared a detailed report. It concluded that Jews never practised ritual murder, and that the charge was pure fabrication.

That study was presented to the pope of the day, then filed away in Rome, unbeknown to the entire world. Roth discovered this document 175 years later, and his monograph on it was published in 1935. The Jewish Board of Deputies, the governing body of British Jewry, thereupon arranged for Roth to present his new work to the current pope personally, in a private audience at the Vatican.

The pope, Pius XI, was pleased to have an Englishman converse in fluent Italian, and showed intense interest. The audience lasted 40 minutes, which is exceptionally long, and at the end of it the pope pronounced a blessing in Hebrew. But Pius XI, almost 80 at that time, was already frail and inactive, and it is doubtful that he took any concrete steps.

In 1928 Roth married Irene Davis. Her background was similar to his, and they proved to be a most compatible couple. By then the Roth household had become a veritable museum. Throughout his life, Roth sought out artifacts and manuscripts, and in due course his collection achieved world fame, particularly in the fields of ketubot, menorot, and haggadot. Irene shared Cecil's enthusiasm for these objects, and was happy to share her home with them.

The size and the constant growth of this collection necessitated the purchase of a large house, and the bulk of their earnings was dedicated to this end and to constant acquisition of new finds, especially Judaica. It ultimately turned out that what had drained their resources in early life provided income to sustain Irene in her quarter-century of widowhood after Roth's death in 1970.

In 1963, most of the collection was sold, with the proviso that it remain in Roth's possession for life. Part of the collection was purchased by the Shopsowitz brothers of Toronto and donated to Congregation Beth Tzedec to establish the Cecil Roth Museum in that synagogue; and part was purchased by the family of Sir Montague Burton, one of Britain's richest Jews, who lived near Leeds, and this segment was donated to the University of Leeds.

From 1939 to 1964 Roth was a lecturer in Jewish studies at Oxford University. For that period, he moved back to the city of his student days. His home became a rendezvous for local students and visiting scholars, and he and Irene proved to be mainstays of Jewish life in Oxford.

Once he was on the university faculty, one of Roth's first acts was to institute special arrangements for observant students to take their exams on days other than Shabbat and yom tov. In his own student years, the university would not accede to any such request. Roth himself simply did not write whichever of the exams were scheduled for those particular days. Even so, he graduated with first class honors, but students who were less brilliant than he had to suffer adverse consequences.

In 1959, the Tito government invited Cecil and Irene to Yugoslavia to see the Sarajevo Haggadah, and to edit it and write a book about it. This much celebrated Haggadah had been produced in Spain about 100 years before the expulsion, and was brought to Sarajevo after the expulsion. It now reposes in the Sarajevo National Museum. When the Nazis occupied that city, the curator feared that they would confiscate it, so he hid it. A German officer indeed did come and demand to have it. The curator told him that a previous German officer had already taken it, and thus the Haggadah was saved.

Seventeen years later, as guests of the government, the Roths were accorded a royal welcome, and were shown inside the national buildings and the local synagogues. In the evening, there was a performance at the Belgrade Opera House, and to their utter astonishment, they were ushered in and seated in the presidential box. As they entered, the audience rose and applauded.

Roth later told his wife that the audience must have thought he was President Tito. To which Irene responded, "Definitely not, you don't look like him in the slightest. They applauded you."

Roth worked on this Haggadah for a year, and the resultant book, the Sarajevo Haggadah, was published in 1960.

Upon reaching retirement age in 1964, Roth left Oxford and took up residence in Jerusalem. He had been appointed editor-in-chief of the forthcoming Encyclopedia Judaica, an assignment that would require about six years. He also accepted a part-time appointment in history at Israel's Bar-Ilan University.

He arrived in Israel in September 1964, and a month later adversity struck. An individual with extremist views circulated a vicious personal attack on Roth's integrity as an observant Jew. He quoted from a passage in a book Roth had published 28 years earlier, in an era when Bible criticism was much in vogue. Roth repeatedly took issue with Bible critics, and in this particular passage he cited their view, as is normal in such context, and immediately proceeded to demonstrate its weakness. This agitator selected that part of the passage which cited the unacceptable view, and, omitting the main part of the passage, which reflected Roth's own position, circulated the deceptive quote and added to it his own distortions.

Unfortunately witch-hunting is a popular sport, and as in the case of the blood libel, the impact of it does not depend on whether it makes sense. Contrary to all logic, the calumny became a cause célèbre in Israel, with numerous debates in newspapers and discussion halls. Roth, accustomed to courtesy and truth, was devastated, and the experience shattered his high assessment of Israel's intellectual standards. Bar-Ilan steadfastly supported him during the ordeal, but within a month he succumbed to a massive heart attack and gave up the lectureship position.

From then on, as soon as he was able to return to work, all his energies were concentrated upon production of Encyclopedia Judaica. His health was failing, and he secretly realized that he was in a race against time. He ardently wanted to complete this monumental work during his lifetime. And indeed he did: the editorial task was finished in May 1970. Cecil Roth died on June 21.

The government of Israel accorded him a state funeral. Among those at the head of the procession were then-president Zalman Shazar and Menachem Begin, followed by numerous luminaries of government, the rabbinate, and academia. The first volume of Encyclopedia Judaica had rolled off the press the previous day.

Holocaust museum may be derailed

Ukrainian-led effort could disrupt plans

By
DAVID LAZARUS and PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporters

TORONTO — A Toronto-based Ukrainian organization is spearheading a campaign among Canadian multicultural groups to press the federal government for a museum to commemorate genocide throughout the 20th century.

The move has prompted concern in the Jewish community that such an effort could derail efforts to establish a dedicated Holocaust museum. The proposal could also pit various ethnic communities against each other, with each vying for inclusion as a victim group at the expense of others.

John Gregorovich, chair of the Ukrainian Canadian Civil Liberties Association, said he has pulled together about 20 organizations in a loose coalition called Canadians For A Genocide Museum (CFAGM). They have met three times since October to discuss what would go into a genocide museum and how to get political support for the project.

The majority of CFAGM's members and observer groups are European in background, including the Ukrainian Canadian Congress (UCC), which supports a genocide museum, but there are Asian participants, Canadian First Nations and Palestine Heritage Canada (PHC). PHC's representative James Kafieh, former head of the Canadian Arab Federation, serves as secretary of Canadians For A Genocide Museum, Gregorovich said.

The group includes representatives from both the Armenian and Turkish communities. Armenians accuse the Turks of responsibility for the century's first genocide in which tens of thousands of Armenians were slaughtered.

Canadian Jewish Congress had been invited to participate in the organization, but the Jewish group never responded to the invitation, Gregorovich said.

Manuel Prutschi, national director of community relations for Congress, acknowledged the invitation but said "our clear impression was that this was an effort to dilute the national Holocaust museum project, so we didn't see any way to be productively involved."

Although no official announcement on any Holocaust museum has been made, Congress president Moshe Ronen said Prime Minister Jean Chrétien assured him during his recent visit to Poland that "an appropriate site" would be found for the Holocaust museum, which would be run under the auspices of the Museum of Civilization.

Dinner Honors Foundation

VANCOUVER — This year's Jewish National Fund (JNF) Pacific region Negev Dinner will honor the Earl and Jennie Lohn Foundation, and raise money for the Ghetto Fighter's House in Israel. Over 350 guests are expected at the dinner at the Four Seasons Hotel, April 11. The Lohn Foundation has supported many Jewish and general charities in Vancouver and in Israel.

New Federation President

VANCOUVER — Robert Willmot has been named the new president of the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver. Willmot moved to Vancouver 10 years ago from Ottawa, where he worked for the external relations committee of the House of Commons, and later for the Canada-Israel Committee.

ISRAEL

Kosovo Aid Offered

JERUSALEM — Israel has offered humanitarian aid to refugees fleeing the fighting in Kosovo. Foreign Minister Ariel Sharon said he had appealed to the governments of Albania and Macedonia for permission to land an airplane carrying humanitarian aid.

Court Censures Minister

JERUSALEM — An Israeli court censured the labor minister for what it termed his "cynical" enforcement of a law barring work on the Sabbath. The judge said Eliyahu Yishai, a member of the Shas party, was abusing his power by selectively enforcing laws that suited his religious outlook. The judge noted that while ministry officials were actively seeking to prevent businesses from operating on the Sabbath, little or no action was being taken to enforce other laws intended to protect the well-being of workers. Yishai said he would appeal the ruling.

WORLD

U.S. Releases Funds

NEW YORK — The U.S. State Department has released $4 million to provide food, clothing and medical treatment to needy Holocaust survivors in eastern Europe and the former Soviet Union. The Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany will administer the aid, the first to be disbursed from the Nazi Persecutee Relief Fund, which was established last year during an international conference on Holocaust assets.

Children Must Testify

NEW YORK — A U.S. federal appeals court has ruled that an Orthodox rabbi's adult children must testify against him before a Newark grand jury in a criminal investigation believed to involve financial impropriety. The family appealed a judge's decision to force the children to testify. The family had cited Jewish law, which prevents children or parents from testifying against each other.

British Bank Implicated

LONDON — The manager of the French branch of Britain's leading commercial bank, Barclays, not only acted as the Nazis' banker during World War II but also volunteered to hand over Jewish staff members, according to documents found in the U.S. National Archives.

Poles Sue Germany

NEW YORK — A group representing some 22,000 Polish victims of the Holocaust plans to sue the German government for about $1.2 billion. The group includes former Nazi slave laborers and concentration camp prisoners. The lawsuit is expected to put more pressure on the German government, which earlier this year began overseeing an effort by 12 leading German companies to create a fund to compensate former slave workers.

Meanwhile, officials representing Polish Jews living in the United States recently met with Polish governmental officials to establish a mechanism for the restitution of private Jewish properties in Poland.

Mormons To Help

SALT LAKE CITY — An accounting firm assisting a Swiss commission in its search for Holocaust assets has turned to the Mormon Church to help identify Holocaust victims. The Mormons, who posthumously baptized more than 400,000 Jewish victims of the Holocaust, maintain extensive records of Jews.

British University Bans Jewish Authors

LONDON — A British university has banned Jewish authors from courses at its campus in the United Arab Emirates (UAE).

The University of Lincolnshire and Humberside has confirmed that books by Jews, as well as those that mention Jews in their bibliographies, are banned by its affiliate in the Gulf state.

In addition, the British Council, a state-run organization designed to promote British cultural achievements abroad, also conceded that it acquiesces in the censorship of works by Jews to accommodate "local political, religious or moral publishing laws."

The Board of Deputies of British Jews, the umbrella organization of British Jewry, expressed outrage and is seeking to have the matter raised in Parliament.

One Jewish official accused the university – one of the newest in Britain – and the council of "putting profits before principles."

A university official initially insisted that the school had never allowed censorship in the United Arab Emirates, but he later admitted that "there is a small amount of censorship which applies to all universities in the UAE."

Tragedy Has Struck

An extraordinary woman in our community—a 50 year old, single mother of 10 children, has tragically passed away after a serious illness.

Her modest salary as a secretary for one of our local Jewish Day Schools, allowed her to barely cover the basic family expenses, let alone the cost of expensive medical treatment and nursing care.

The children have been left with about $200k in debts and no further means of financial support. Funds are required for basic necessities such as food, clothing, housing and Jewish education.

The family desperately wants to stay together, with the older children taking on the responsibility of raising and ultimately marrying off the younger ones and themselves.

We appeal to you to support our community's efforts to establish a trust fund for these children. All cheques over $10 will receive charitable tax receipts. In the spirit of Jewish compassion and generosity at this holiday time, please open your hearts and donate generously. Thank you.

Premier's brother poses questions for Quebec's Jews

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Gérard Bouchard, the Quebec premier's brother, had a lot of questions for the Jewish community.

He initiated a conference for French and Jewish Quebecers because he wanted to know why, as a minority, Jews are not more sensitive to French Quebecers' fears for the survival of their culture; why they seem to focus on anti-Semitism in Quebec and not in English Canada; and why they do not have more sympathy for Quebec sovereignty when they themselves have such an attachment to Israel.

The questions, never directly answered, represented a moment of frankness during a day-long conference entitled Les Relations judéo-québécoises: identités et perceptions mutuelles, organized by the Jewish Public Library (JPL), Dialogue St. Urbain, and the Institut interuniversitaire de recherches sur les populations (IREP), headed by Bouchard at the Université du Québec à Chicoutimi.

The event, held at Temple Emanu-El-Beth Sholom, drew almost 200 people, many of them French Quebecers. While some were academics or specialists, a large proportion were from the general public, apparently attracted by interviews Bouchard and co-organizer Pierre Anctil of Dialogue St. Urbain had given to Le Devoir and La Presse.

Anctil believes the turnout reflects a growing interest among

From the editor's desk

Forever, eternally alive

Nisan stretches the heart. At the middle of the month, when the moon is at its fullest in the early night sky, we assemble with family and friends to recount how an ancient tyranny was vanquished.

We celebrate Pesach.

Barely one week after Pesach ends, on the 27th day of Nisan, when the moon is pale and thin, we assemble with the community to recount how a modern tyranny was vanquished.

We commemorate Yom Hashoah v'hagvurah.

The end of the ancient tyranny set the human soul soaring onto a new terrain of freedom and dignity.

The end of the modern tyranny, as we know, set the human soul, seared by horrific suffering, also onto a "new terrain," but one previously unimagined and unimaginable, of state-organized genocide.

We are obliged to remember and to recount for all generations, the ending of both tyrannies.

Helping us to remember the vanquishing of the modern tyranny are an increasing number of personal "recountings" made suddenly more urgent by the passage of more than 50 years since the end of World War II.

In this column, I shall draw readers' attention to four such "recountings" that have recently come across my desk.

With the passing of the years and the passing of the survivors, so too are passing the direct, first-hand, living memories of the Shoah.

It is our duty, therefore, as Jews and as civilized and civilizing human beings to ensure that those memories, when no longer living, remain forever and eternally alive.

The purpose of this column is to take some more steps along the path of fulfilling that duty.

It is of course, deeply true that no written matter, poetry or prose, can communicate or express to someone who was not there, the experience and horrors that were, effectively, incommunicable and inexpressible.

But how else, other than with our writings and our stories, can one generation speak to the next and hope to preserve for it the memories that were formed in the generations that came before?

Sometimes it is easier to read about the Shoah for shorter, but more concentrated periods of time than it is for longer, more prolonged ones. Sometimes poetry enables one to more readily read about the Shoah.

Beyond Lament: Poets of the World Bearing Witness to the Holocaust, edited by Marguerite M. Striar, Northwestern University Press, 1998, is a powerful, compelling anthology of nearly 300 new and previously published poems. It offers beautifully styled, touching poems from a number of internationally renowned poets. Among the poets included in the collection are Canadians Shel Krakofsky, former CJN columnist, and Seymour Mayne.

A new and stirring work by the "next" generation, the children of the survivors, is The River Midnight by Lilian Nattel, Knopf Canada, 1998.

With the same literary and emotional force achieved by Anne Michaels' Fugitive Pieces, a few years ago, Nattel has crafted a tour de force. Widely reviewed and widely acclaimed, The River Midnight brings to life aspects and evocations of the eastern European shtetl world that was destroyed.

Like Michaels', Nattel's work is all the more moving because it is the affirmation and testament of the child to her parents.

More traditional testaments are those of the survivors to their children. Some survivors are so determined to record their memories and memoirs, they find a way to publish them themselves.

Two such survivors recently sent their memoirs to The CJN.

Morris Bitterman, the retired ritual director of the Beth Tikvah Synagogue in Toronto, born in Kroscienko, Poland, has written Amcha: The Remembrance of a Holocaust Survivor. The Hebrew word amcha, meaning your people, was the code word spoken between survivors after the war to assist in identifying fellow Jews. The book is a narrative that carries the reader from Bitterman's childhood in Poland, through the war, to Israel and to Canada.

Stanley Hochman, retired businessman in Toronto, born in Demblin, Poland, has written Personal Memoirs World War II. Hochman is a talented poet. His memoirs are more of a pastiche, a collection of different essays and poems in English and Polish, than a narrative of the past.

Both Bitterman and Hochman are writing for the record and for their children. As Bitterman writes in his introduction, "This book is written so that we might know and remember [the millions of others who did not survive]. This story is not primarily about courage or luck or any personal attributes. It is about the constant presence of evil and its place in the world. We must forever oppose it. We must never forget." (Original emphasis)

One hopes that the proliferation of testamentary and other kinds of "recountings" means that rather than the "memory" of the Shoah fading over time, it is becoming ever more entrenched in the Jewish and western cultural/historical/educational/literary psyche.

Filer honored with lifetime achievement award

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Justice Sam Filer was honored recently with a special human rights award for lifetime achievement, presented by the League for Human Rights of B'nai Brith Canada at a luncheon held at the Sheraton Centre during the League's international symposium on Hate on the Internet.

Filer, who has amyotrophic lateral sclerosis (ALS), a rapidly deteriorating neuromuscular condition, is paralyzed and unable to speak without mechanical assistance.

That has not prevented him however, from continuing to work from the Bench.

Secretary of State for International Financial Institutions Jim Peterson helped to pay tribute to his personal friend.

Peterson said that the special chapter of the Talmud, Ethics of our Fathers, "amounts to a virtual catalogue of Sam's values.

"Do not separate yourself from the community; and in a place where no leader can be found, be that leader, " Peterson quoted, referring to his friend.

Peterson noted some of Filer's many achievements: He was co-founder of the Canadian Committee of Lawyers and Jurists for Soviet Jewry, a national leader in the Soviet Jewry movement, chair of both the national Civil Liberties Section of the Canadian Bar Association and its Ontario branch; and a member of the national executive of Canadian Jewish Congress.

"He played a strong leadership role in human rights in the community and nationally – always a gentleman, gracious and prepared to give the benefit of doubt – never judgmental except from the Bench."

Reminding the audience that "hate is not just a Jewish issue, but one that goes to the very heart of what constitutes a civilized nation," Peterson said Filer worked to combat hate in all its forms, including Holocaust denial, anti-Semitism, the Arab economic boycott, and all issues affecting or demeaning any single group or person.

Peterson thanked Filer, saying, "From each of us I say to you: You have made a difference/ to what we have done/ the values we hold/ in the good that lives on."

Dr. Lawrence Hart, president of B'nai Brith Canada, described Filer as an extraordinary human being. "You are a role model for all of us to strive to do better in both our personal and private lives."

Reading from a message from Rabbi Gunther Plaut who was unable to attend, Rabbi Dow Marmur said the tribute to Filer "is a recognition of the outstanding communal service that marked the life of not only Sam, but [his wife] Toni as well."

He gave special praise to Filer's colleagues in the judiciary, "who have made it possible for him to continue his work and strengthen his lease on life."

Patrick LeSage, chief justice of the Ontario court's General Division, also praised Filer's wife, Toni Silberman, saying, "Toni, you deserve and are entitled to share in the honor being bestowed on Sam today."

LeSage spoke of Filer's early days in Saskatchewan: "Sam is a representative of Saskatchewan's greatest export – that is talent," he said.

Filer was appointed to the District Court of Ontario in 1984. Three and-a-half years later he was diagnosed with ALS.

LeSage emphasized that the disease does not affect intellectual functioning, vision or hearing. "Sam is as astute, aware, knowledgeable, bright and wise today as he was yesterday, as he was a year ago, as he was 12 years ago prior to his diagnosis."

Marvin Kurz, national co-chair of the League for Human Rights, Harriet Morris, who chaired the tribute luncheon, and Hart presented the award. The citation recognizes "your outstanding professional accomplishments and your unfailing commitment and contributions to the advancement of human rights and social justice locally, nationally and internationally."

Silberman spoke on her husband's behalf from a speech he had prepared. Thanking those who paid tribute to him, Filer said, "Knowing the calibre of the previous recipients, knowing how their efforts and achievements, individually and collectively, have irreversibly altered the course of human rights in our society and have changed the way we treat one another, is the source of my humility."

Filer commended his colleagues on the Bench and in the legal profession. "That I continue to work as a judge is a testament to the courage of the judiciary in regarding me in terms of what I can do, rather than what I can't – and [to those] who recognize that though my means of access to the seat of justice is restricted, it does not necessarily impair my ability to administer it."

He said the cornerstones of human rights – freedom, justice and peace, fairness and equality – are founded on the concepts of human worth, mutual respect and the sanctity of human life, the full range of ordinary, everyday activities in the lives of ordinary human beings.

Silberman concluded with a personal message, using the Yiddish expression, "bis 120 – may you live to 120." She noted that their daughter Jaimie was heard to say about the award, "Lifetime achievement? But Daddy's only 63. It should be an award for half a lifetime achievement!"

Silberman said it was a point well taken, adding, "We – the children and I – with the help of God and the continuing support, love, friendship and encouragement of our family and friends, will continue to do everything in our power to ensure that Sam delivers on the remaining 57 years."

Others participating in the tribute luncheon included Ontario Chief Justice Roy McMurtry; Frank Dimant, executive vice-president of B'nai Brith Canada; and Rochelle Wilner, co-chair with Kurz of the International Symposium on Hate on the Internet.

Harnick says he won't run again

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Ontario Attorney General Charles Harnick, one of three Jewish MPPs, announced last week that he won't seek re-election in the next provincial vote.

Harnick, 48, who has represented the substantially Jewish riding of Willowdale since 1990 and is the only Jewish member of the Tory government, said he's stepping down "to pursue other professional opportunities" and to spend more time with his family.

A lawyer, Harnick has been visible on the Jewish scene. He is active within Canadian Jewish Congress and the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem.

He barely won his riding the first time. But in 1995, he trounced his Liberal opponent, former Canadian Jewish Congress president Les Scheininger, by more than 9,000 votes, and was appointed attorney general and minister responsible for native affairs.

In a statement released to the media last week, Harnick said his decision was not made lightly. He paid tribute to Premier Mike Harris and said he would "do everything possible to assist the re-election of his government and the election of my successor as Progressive Conservative candidate in Willowdale."

He also touted his achievements: restructuring Ontario's Legal Aid Plan; reducing the backlog of criminal court cases; introducing the Victim's Bill of Rights and the Office for Victims of Crime; establishing specialized Domestic Violence courts; and creating the Family Responsibility Office to ensure that spouses meet their financial obligations to their partners and children.

Charles Harnick

In some circles, Harnick won plaudits for a program that puts some first-time young offenders before a community justice panel rather than a court.

It was Harnick who bore the brunt of the government's about-face on compensation for the three surviving Dionne quintuplets.

Moments after Harnick stated he won't run again, David Young, a former vice-chair of the North York Board of Education, announced he will seek the Tory nomination in Willowdale.

Young, 42, spent six years as a trustee of the board. He is also active in the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem. He and his family are members of B'nai Brith and Beth Radom Congregation.

Lubavitch conference draws over 1,000 women

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Spreading the message of Lubavitch and Jewish practice is a family affair, often made possible by shlichim or emissaries, according to Goldie Plotkin, rebbitzen of Chabad Lubavitch of Markham.

Many of the outreach activities we have seen here include mitzvah mobiles, the sukkah at City Hall, and information booths about kosher shopping and Jewish festivals at major supermarkets.

Plotkin was banquet chair at the International Lubavitch Women Emissaries Conference, held recently at the Lubavitch World Headquarters in New York.

Over 1,000 women attended, she said, from throughout the United States and Canada, and from such far-flung locations as the former Soviet Union, Thailand, China, Congo, Japan, and Uruguay.

They spent a weekend learning Torah, taking part in workshops on such subjects as professional development, time management, how to teach the laws of family purity, and how to found and develop day camps, mikvot and preschools.

The experience, she said, was "like giving water after Yom Kippur. It was [a gathering] with people that understand you, that know what it is like to struggle with raising kids in places where there are very few, if any, other religious kids."

One of the most impressive parts of the conference, she said, was the baby room, where 250 babies were cared for by a rotating series of babysitters. Each mother was issued a beeper that went off when her baby needed her.

At the same time, the emissaries' daughters, between the ages of nine and 12, held their own convention, where they had the opportunity to meet and exchange ideas and experiences with other youngsters.

Children part of work

There is also an annual convention for male shlichim and their sons.

Plotkin stressed that emmisaries involve their whole family in their work. Both parents teach, establish institutions and programs, and work to bring people closer to observance.

The children, even at a very young age, are taught that they, too, are a part of the work. They help host Shabbat and holiday meals, and understand that their parents are out a good deal of the time, and that they must "share" their parents with an endless stream of guests and demands.

It is difficult, Plotkin said, for the wife, who has to perform her responsibilities as a shlichah, to run a household and care for her family.

"We have to always be at our best," she explained – "the way we look, our clothes, and our house that always has to be clean, because there is always someone dropping in."

Lubavitch youngsters often start out by working at summer camps and going to small communities to help out wherever they are needed.

For those young men and women who want to be shlichim, an involvement in these activities becomes an essential element of "the checklist" of characteristics sought for in a partner.

A special office established for couples who want to become shlichim "makes a shidduch," Plotkin explained, between what the couple wants to do and what openings are available. For instance, one couple might like to work for an established Chabad community, while another might want to start a new one.

Each family is almost completely on its own financially – Lubavitch headquarters does not pay salaries, housing costs, or travel expenses.

Rebbitzen Goldie Plotkin of Chabad Lubavitch of Markham chaired the closing banquet of the 11th International Lubavitch Women Emissaries Conference in New York.

The late Lubavitcher Rebbe, Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson, encouraged his followers to go to different communities to bring Yiddishkeit to Jews who perhaps had never had exposure to it. For the shlichim, it is a source of pride and duty to carry out this wish.

For you, a deal.

Shoah

The difficulty in commemorating the Shoah is not the lack of testimony. It is, rather, the lack of comprehension. No matter how hard we try, no matter how firm the resolve, the individual human mind cannot grasp the singular, horrifying detail of the evil perpetrated by the Nazis and their collaborators: six million.

We therefore seek associative devices and cognitive aids to help us try to grasp that detail.

Someone once suggested the following: If we were to set aside merely one minute of our time for each of the six million – surely one minute for each life is not too long an embrace of time – perhaps holding a pleasant thought, reading a poem, or casting an admiring glance at a work of art, we would have to set aside 12 years to complete the task.

If we were to set aside merely one hour of our time for each of the six million – is one hour too much to ask for a human life? – perhaps reading a story to a child, going for a walk with a friend, or planting a row of flowers, we would have to set aside 702 years to complete the task.

If we were to set aside merely one day of our time for each of the six million – how unreasonable, after all, is one day when set against one life? – perhaps volunteering in a hospital, fasting, or meditating, we would have to set aside 16,854 years to complete the task.

No matter how hard we try, no matter how firm the resolve, the individual human mind cannot grasp the singular, horrifying detail of the evil perpetrated by the Nazis and their collaborators.

V'gvurah

But there are details that the mind can indeed grasp: for example, the resistance and the heroism of the oppressed against their oppressors. At every age, in every situation, in camps, villages, cities, fields and forests, there was resistance. Much of it has been chronicled; much of it has not.

For the resistance of which we know and for the resistance of which we will never know, let us sing the chorus of the anthem composed by Hirsh Glick that has come to symbolize the details that our minds do indeed grasp.

Never say that there is only death for you,
Though leaden skies may be concealing days of blue,
Because the hour we have hungered for is near,
As we march, the earth shall tremble: We are here!

Kosovo

Yom Hashoah v'hagvurah is the commemoration of the attempted genocide of an entire people, the uniquely Jewish disaster that we call the Holocaust. But in the history of mankind, the attempted genocide of an entire people has not been uniquely directed at the Jews. Alas, as these words are being written, the world is witness to the brutalization, if not yet the genocide, of the ethnic Albanian people of Kosovo. Singled out for expulsion and slaughter, more than a third of the entire people are now stateless and homeless, much like the remnant of the Jews after World War II. Many experts fear that within three weeks, all of the ethnic Albanians will have been expelled from Kosovo.

This is an offence to conscience, to history, to every value we Canadians hold dear. We therefore urge all Canadians to support the government and the actions taken by NATO, even if those actions are doomed ultimately to fail.

WISDOM OF THE AGES
"Speak to the children of Israel to tell them these are the animals that you may eat from among the creatures that are on the earth." (Parshat Shmini)

Ultra-Orthodox deserve no special rights

As if the government of the State of Israel does not have enough on its plate in trying to achieve peace with the Palestinians, the Syrians and the Lebanese, we now have the festering problem between the ultra-Orthodox on one hand and the Conservative and Reform Jews on the other. The Supreme Court of Israel charged with the responsibility of enforcing the rule of law has tried to mediate and modify the demands of the ultra-Orthodox consistent with its position as the final arbiter in a secular state. The frightening call for a civil war is heard from certain ultra-Orthodox quarters.

While Israel describes itself as a Jewish state, it is still first and foremost committed to upholding democratic principles. That includes the rights and obligations of all Jews, as well as Christian and Muslim citizens. Once democratic ideals are compromised and abrogated, then Israel becomes no better than its totalitarian and dictatorial Arab neighbors.

No one is denying the ultra-Orthodox the right to practise their faith as they see fit, but it cannot be at the expense of the rights of other citizens of Israel. Their position and influence in the Israeli Government should be proportionate to their votes, and not be used as a bartering chip to compromise the rights and freedoms of other Israelis.

In Canada and in the United States, and indeed in all other democratic countries, the ultra-Orthodox enjoy religious freedom at the same level as all free men and women, and their status in Israel should be no more and no less. To do otherwise, would threaten the rule of law and that would lead to the destruction of Israel more predictably than through wars with its neighbors.

A question on school funding for Liberal leader

On Dec. 17, you reported that provincial Liberal leader Dalton McGuinty indicated to the executive of the Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, that he "has no ideological opposition to ensuring public funds support Jewish day schools."

Yet, in a speech to the Ontario Liberal party provincial council in Kingston, Ont., on Oct. 16, McGuinty had this to say on education funding: "We're fighting for publicly funded, publicly delivered education... We're against voucher programs. We're against charter schools."

In light of this, I would like to issue an open invitation to McGuinty to kindly explain to the Canadian Jewish community how he would fund Jewish day schools.

'Just a Second' good place to donate clothing

Recently a good friend whose husband had died, asked me to find out if there was anyplace to donate good used clothing in the Jewish community in Toronto. I called Jewish Family and Child Services and was pleased to learn that they run a store called Just a Second at 4117 Bathurst St. at York Downs, Monday to Thursday from 10 a.m. to 6 p.m. and Sunday from 10 a.m. to 3 p.m. Their clients and clients of the Jewish Immigrant Aid Service are able to shop at the store free of charge when they bring a letter identifying them.

Now there are two Internet cafes in Jerusalem

Re: "Night Life in Jerusalem" (CJN, Mar. 11). It was refreshing to read an additional perspective on Israel's beautiful capital city.

There is one piece of information I would like to correct. The article mentioned Cafe Strudel as being the only Internet and e-mail cafe in Jerusalem. This lovely cave-like cafe happens to be owned by a cousin of mine. However, as of May 1998, there is another Internet cafe at 9 Heleni Hamalka called The Net Cafe. This is also a very lovely cafe with entertainment, a book exchange, and even computer and e-mail lessons. This new cafe happens to be owned by a cousin of my husband.

Legacy

By ELI HONIG

I have an early and hazy recollection of seeing my uncle and aunt when they came to visit me following my circumcision. I was 4 years old. I had been born in occupied France and subsequently hidden. My mother later told me that it was my uncle who had searched for a mohel in postwar Paris. I remember my bris and I remember my uncle.

I remember, years later in Montreal, sitting next to my uncle in shul, when he turned to me and said, "I don't know when I should tell Lipa." Lipa was his son, my first cousin.

I asked him, "Tell him what?"

He replied that he had been married before the war and had had a son, Shlomo. Both wife and son perished in the Shoah. I was shaken by his revelation to me. All I had known was that he had married my mother's sister after the war.

Isaac Gabel Roth, a survivor of nine concentration camps, was born in Czeszanow, Poland, in 1909. I only have sparse knowledge of his early life because he never spoke of it, not to me at least.

What I do have, is the cherished legacy of an uncle trying to share some of his wartime experiences with his nephew. For some reason he confided in me, even baring his soul on occasion. Perhaps it was because I had lost my father in Auschwitz, and he felt it his duty to take his place in some manner. Perhaps it was because my cousin Lipa was still too young to understand.

On another occasion, he told me of the time when he was with a large work party in a labor camp. An SS officer approached him and ordered him to sing. When he hesitated, the officer started to shout. My uncle asked him what he should sing and the reply was just to sing. And so he started to sing in a small voice:

Zol shoin zyne der geulah
Zol shoin zyne der geulah
Moshiach zol shoin kumen
Let the redemption come soon
Let the redemption come soon
The Messiah should come soon

The lone voice was slowly joined by others until the combined voices reached a crescendo – the tormented momentarily outwitting their tormentors. Their cry for deliverance rose from the abyss of despair.

Years later, I read of a similar incident recorded by Moshe Prager in his book, Sparks of Glory. The niggun, the melody, was familiar to me in my youth. I rarely hear it now, but whenever I think of it, the song and the story reverberate in my mind.

My uncle also recounted to me how he had managed to steal a bit of flour from the camp kitchen so that he might make some matzot for Pesach. He was baking them in a field when a German guard caught him. It was late in the war, and by this time the guards themselves were hungry. Miraculously, the guard accepted some matzah and let him go.

And I ask myself: What drove my uncle and others like him, to defy all human odds – to even contemplate such a venture. My mind reels.

I don't remember how old I was when I was sitting next to my uncle in shul and his face suddenly turned pale. He started to tremble. He pointed and said to me, "See that man over there? He was a kapo in our camp." My uncle's face portrayed sheer torture as he wrestled with himself. He wanted to scream to the highest heavens, to denounce the man on earth. And yet he also saw a broken Jew, who himself must have seen indescribable things before he became a kapo – a Jew who was trying somehow to redeem himself. I saw an impossible mixture of hatred and compassion, but my uncle kept his peace. And the scene still haunts me.

For a number of years after his wartime experiences and the loss of his first family, my uncle questioned, and for a time, lost his faith. He slowly regained it, perhaps as he built a new family and had another child.

May 27, 1987, marked shloshim, 30 days after my uncle's passing. I was in shul with my cousin, and at the end of morning services, I took notice of the old and large tallit that Lipa was folding. I must have been staring because he remarked to me that it had belonged to his father, and then he asked me if I knew the story. I didn't, and he proceeded to tell me.

It was 1946, in an open air market in Katowice, an industrial city in the south of Poland, an hour or two from Auschwitz. Isaac was out shopping when he saw a cart laden with vegetables. What really caught his eye, was the tallit that was protruding from under the produce. As recognition set in, he knew that he could not leave it where it was – he had to redeem it. He started bargaining with the vendor, explaining to him that he needed a bedsheet like the one lining the bottom of the cart. Finally, he succeeded in buying it.

> 'What really caught his eye, was the tallit...'

Upon returning home, he examined the tallit, and to his horror he saw that it had blood stains on it. He was faced with a mindnumbing dilemma. How could he possibly wear this tallit, knowing all too well the fate its owner must have suffered? And how could this tallit, hallowed through the agony of its owner, not be worn?

He eventually settled on the only solution that he could live with – and this too must have tormented him. For as long as he lived, while both questioning and affirming his faith, Isaac Gabel Roth wore this tallit on three days each year – on the Days of Awe, Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur. And I marvel and I cry to this day. From what depths does the courage and faith of such a simple Jew come?

Yehay Zichro Baruch.

May his memory be for a blessing.

Opinions

An officer and a gentleman

In a month in which the Israeli Supreme Court was attacked for its continued activism, a recent ruling set a new standard for conduct in the military and civilian spheres.

Shira Herzog in Toronto

In what will be known as the Galilee Decision, the court, in its capacity as the High Court of Justice, overruled the decisions of the chief of staff and minister of defence to promote Brigadier-General Nir Galilee. In so doing, the court ruled for the appellant, a woman who served as Galilee's secretary during her military service several years ago and who claimed that he has used his position to coerce her to engage in sexual relations.

Galilee had been reprimanded at the time, but the current chief of staff, Shaul Mofaz, as well as his predecessor, Amnon Lipkin-Shahak, claimed that Galilee's credentials for the new position outweighed the moral considerations.

Like the American and Canadian armies, the Israel Defence Force (IDF) has a strict code against sexual harassment. In fact, as of last year, any sexual relations between an officer and a soldier under his or her command, are considered coercive. But as the recent debate in Canada has demonstrated, the code remains theoretical in the face of rampant harassment.

The recent court ruling in Israel is the most public airing of the issue ever held, and given the seniority of the court, the most significant.

The case resulted in an intense debate. Those who saw it as yet another intervention of the High Court in the decision-making process in the army ignored the long history of such interventions. If in the distant past, the court was prepared to accept "security considerations" at face value without a challenge, in recent years it has overruled the chief of staff and the prime minister on more than one occasion when security was used as the motivation for a controversial action. This is, however, the first ruling to challenge the chief of staff on appointments in the IDF.

The court's ruling has not yet been published in full, and its reasons have yet to be made public. But in effect, the court has stated that the conventional, narrow view of security considerations and military qualifications as sufficient grounds for promotion is inappropriate. The ruling serves as a clarion call to the IDF, saying that it has to catch up with the changed norms of Israeli civil society.

The ruling has been described as a watershed on more than one level. For women in the army, it is an important step along the road to greater responsibility and a more egalitarian standing. This is a far cry from the old, popular saying, "The good (guys) to the air force, and the good (women) to the pilots."

Predictably, there has been a sharp increase in complaints of sexual harassment since the Galilee case went to court. In a society in which the seniority of men in the military has given them an advantage in civilian positions as well, these changing norms are significant.

To understand its larger implications, the Galilee case has to be seen in the context of a broader debate on security in Israeli society. In a recently published book, Security Concerns, several authors argue that security is a far more complex concept than the straightforward measurement of the objective strength of the IDF. In the IDF itself, there is far more discussion today on military and political questions. On the issue of withdrawal from southern Lebanon for example, there is a diversity of opinions within the army. And most of the former generals who have gone into politics accept the establishment of a Palestinian state.

But on other issues, such as the position of the senior command, the IDF remains conservative and resistant to change. In the matter of Galilee's promotion, the chief of staff argued that he was indispensable, in spite of his violation of the code on sexual conduct. The court has ruled unequivocally that other, ethical, "civil" considerations are no less important than Galilee's military qualifications.

In this sense, the ruling has poured new meaning into the principle of civilian authority over the military. Dr. Yoram Peri, who has followed the relationship between the military and the civilian echelons for decades, describes Galilee as "one more important step in the changing nature of Israel from a mobilized society to a civil society".

The court made it clear that the chain of command stops not with the chief of staff, or even the minister of defence or prime minister, but with the judiciary as it reflects the values of Israeli society. As a senior military commentator said, "even a commander has a commander."

NATO bombings set a precedent

As of this writing, the bombing of Serb positions in Kosovo, and in Yugoslavia generally, has begun. It is difficult for me to articulate a position on the merits of the NATO initiative against the Serbs without the intrusion of Jewish/Canadian memories and concerns.

Morton Weinfeld in Montreal

The Serbs are today associated with the concept of ethnic cleansing, and with brutalities directed against Croats, Bosnians, and now Albanians in Kosovo. They – or more precisely, their leaders and some army units — are justly reviled for their brutal atrocities, including mass murder, mass rape and burning and looting of homes. NATO in all likelihood should have acted sooner.

But the issue has shades of gray; it is far from black and white. During World War II, the Serbs, like the Jews, were victims of the Nazi puppet regime in Croatia. It was the Ustasha Croatians who systematically murdered Jews, Serbs and Gypsies, in camps, on the streets and in the countryside.

But that was then. Now concerns for contemporary realpolitik and morality must be considered in apportioning blame. The Serbs in Yugoslavia draw their support largely from Russia – where instability and looming anti-Semitism threaten. And there is the indisputable evidence of the horrors of their ethnic cleansing, which would seem to require an immediate and harsh response. Many supporters of the raids, from Clinton on down, invoke the "lessons of the Holocaust."

What, if anything, can be said on behalf of the Yugoslav Serbs? To claim that others have also been guilty of war crimes and crimes against humanity, notably the Croats, does not excuse them. Not for a minute. But some commentators, like A.M. Rosenthal of the New York Times, have pointed out two things:

First, the world is awash with dictators and thugs who oppress groups within their own territory, without drawing such a heavy response. Think of Turkey's treatment of Kurds, Chinese of Tibetans, Indonesians of East Timorese, Sudanese of its black population in the south. The tough defence of human rights on behalf of the Kosovar Albanians is selective. As Rosenthal put it, Clinton "may lose men and women in Kosovo, but was not willing to lose any trade with China." The Balkans are in Europe, and the victims are white Europeans. While the Allies can tolerate brutality elsewhere, they apparently draw the line in Europe after the experience of two world wars.

Second, there are many civil war situations in which force has been used, is being used, or may be required to put down rebellions or independence movements. Lincoln used force to defeat Southern secession. Canadian authorities used force to quash the rebellions of 1837-38, as well as Louis Riel's efforts to create a Métis homeland in the west.

As of this writing it seems likely that the European Union will issue a pronouncement strongly supportive of Palestinian independence. Suppose Yasser Arafat does issue a unilateral declaration of independence on May 4, or soon after, accompanied by an explosion of violence by both terrorist and Palestinian forces directed at Israel. Israel might well respond with force. Should Israel then be the target of NATO air strikes?

Seeming to promote Kosovar independence is a risky policy, in terms of European stability. The Balkans are full of restless national minorities. Some early cracks in NATO unity may reflect this realization. And what if the Basques, Corsicans, Catalans, Scots, and yes – Québécois – decide to declare unilateral independence from their "masters" aided with escalations of terrorist violence to drive home the point? Would they too have NATO's tacit blessing?

The air strikes at Yugoslav military targets have clearly set a precedent, quite dissimilar from the Desert Storm operation against Iraq. Iraq invaded a sovereign state; Kosovo is clearly a province. NATO rightly decided that enough is enough. The challenge for the west is to defend weak minorities while at the same time not opening up the floodgates of political instability and a new tribalism.

The hidden homeless

Exposing social problems in our society is never much fun, but reading about it is easier than holding the short stick on fortune.

It is no accident that the seder celebration begins, in effect, with an invitation to the homeless – or at least to those who have no opportunity to observe the holiday with food and drink. The reader holds up a piece of matzah and says ha lachma anya, Behold the bread of poverty! The door stands open for those unable to celebrate the festival. In that sense, Pesach is the perfect time to remind ourselves of the bitter reality of homelessness.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

The report by Anne Golden about homelessness did much to raise everyone's awareness of the problem. Her report stressed that a "typical" homeless person was no longer alcoholic, adult or male. Youth and families with children are now the fastest-growing groups in the homeless and at risk populations. These families accounted for 46 percent of the people using hostels in Toronto. In Toronto, where homelessness is a social disgrace, more than 1,000 people are on the waiting list for affordable housing. Holy Blossom Temple has been the pioneering synagogue by accommodating some 17 homeless people once a week for dinner, and a large portion of them for sleeping in the synagogue premises overnight.

Why is affordable housing so scarce? The Golden report says that the withdrawal of support by both the federal and provincial governments accounts for the absence of new social housing programs. Domestic violence, physical and sexual abuse, and the alienation of individuals from family and friends, have increased the incidence of this social scourge.

A family on social assistance spends about $200 of the "basic allowance" to maintain its housing. This leaves between $250 and $350 a month, depending on family size, for all other needs. Families find this situation extremely difficult. Any unexpected expense can easily lead to rental arrears and eventually to eviction.

Contrary to public impression, the homeless population is quite heterogeneous. There are men, women and children; there are young, middle aged and older people. Contrary to public impression, the city of Toronto is not alone responsible for the problem; surrounding communities contribute to it. Nearly 50 percent of shelter users in Toronto come from outside the city.

But any figures that we read about are, in fact, too low, for they do not take into consideration the "hidden homeless." These are people who have a place to sleep. But they crowd in with families and friends, so that there are uncounted instances where five or more persons of all ages live in a single room or other insufficient accommodation. They are not seen in the streets, but they are deprived, physically and emotionally, as if they had no place where to rest at night.

They make the obvious problem even greater and its solution more urgent. We have to become accustomed to surrendering a part of our income to provide a human framework for families that deserve better in our otherwise affluent society. The opening words of the Haggadah, cited above, are a cogent reminder of this need.

The Kirshner File

Diaries record torments of Nazi era

Victor Klemperer, a German Jew from Dresden, kept diaries about everyday life in Nazi Germany, never intending to publish them. However, in 1995, they were published in Germany to great acclaim, possibly because Klemperer's honesty and directness disarmed readers. The English edition, covering the years 1933-1941, is now in print under the title of I Will Bear Witness (Random House).

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

A professor of Romance languages and literature at Dresden Technical University, Klemperer was born in 1881 in Landsberg on the Warthe, the youngest child of a Reform rabbi. Following the example of his two brothers, he converted to Christianity. In 1906, he married Eva Schlemmer, a musician from a Protestant family. The couple were childless.

Klemperer's diaries, a window into a country seduced by a racist and imperialist ideology, are an unmitigated chronicle of despair and disillusionment. He records the harsh injustices Jews had to endure. He frets about his job. He complains about his increasing isolation. He embraces his Germanness but ruefully acknowledges his status as a reviled outsider.

Throughout his ordeal, he copes with depression. "It is shocking how day after day naked acts of violence, breaches of the law (and) barbaric opinions appear quite undisguised as official decree," he writes in 1933.

The anti-Semitic edicts he records come thick and fast through 1934. In Breslau, Jewish lawyers are forbidden to enter the courts. In Munich, Jewish professors have been prevented from setting foot in the university. "I feel shame more than fear, shame for Germany." And, in a revealing aside, he adds: "I have truly always felt like a German."

The atmosphere grows gloomier. "No one breathes freely anymore," he observes. "For us personally, everything is also heading for catastrophe." Klemperer refuses to think about tomorrow, and he rejects Palestine as a possible haven. "Anyone who goes there exchanges nationalism and narrowness for nationalism and narrowness."

In 1935, his faculty curtly dismisses him. But it takes him a year to draw an appropriate conclusion. "...the Jewish dream of being German had been a dream after all," he concedes. "That is the most bitter truth for me."

Swallowing yet another indignity, Klemperer discovers that, as a non-Aryan, he is no longer welcome at the reading room of the library. As 1936 peters out, he speaks of his impoverishment, financial woes and isolation from society. Midway through 1937, the last tatters of his illusions fall away. "I believe ever more strongly that Hitler really does embody the soul of the German people..."

New torments face him. He loses his driving licence in 1938. He and his wife are forced to move into a communal home for Jews in 1940. In 1941, when Germany makes it impossible for Jews to emigrate legally, he learns that he must wear the degrading yellow star armband.

Shafts of goodness pierce the darkness. A student turns up with rations they have been denied by the state. Consoling Klemperer after an anti-Semitic incident in which he has been branded as a "yid" by a bunch of unruly youths, an elderly porter assures him, "We're all human beings."

As I Will Bear Witness draws to a close, Klemperer expresses shock about the deportations of Jews to Poland. "They have to leave almost literally naked and penniless," he laments. And in the penultimate pages, he cites the passage of decrees which forbid Jews to use public telephones and impose further curfews on them.

In volume two of I Will Bear Witness, which will be published later this year, Klemperer takes his harrowing story up to 1945, when Dresden was pulverized by a massive Allied bombing raid. One supposes that it, too, will be mournful – yet instructive – in nature.

Troubling issue explored by historian

Anti-Semitism is an old story, but in Germany racist stereotypes evolved into a popular ideology of such lethal force that it culminated in genocide. Daniel Goldhagen, in Hitler's Willing Executioners: Ordinary Germans and the Holocaust, has elaborated upon this phenomenon. In Ideology and Death: Why the Holocaust Happened in Germany (Ivan R. Dee), John Weiss, a Catholic professor of history at Lehman College, cogently explores this troubling issue at greater length.

Weiss' thesis is that upper-class reactionaries, middle-class nationalists and lower-class populists used anti-Semitism as a weapon against the growing influence of democratic liberalism and economic modernization long before the Nazis demonized Jews. Lest he be accused of racism himself, Weiss wisely adds that about half of all Germans, mainly, but not solely progressives and leftists, categorically rejected racist violence.

Weiss begins with an analysis of the Christian foundations of genocidal anti-Semitism. Martin Luther's attacks against Jews were vile, but they were accompanied by a torrent of pamphlets issued by like-minded theologians. And, he points out, respected 19th century Lutheran clerics sought to reverse the civil rights Bismarck had granted Jews when Germany was unified.

In Weiss' view, the widespread dissemination of racist-tinged novels and political works – Gustav Freytag's Debit and Credit (1855) and Theodore Fritsch's The Handbook of Anti-Semitism (1896), to name but two – also fanned the flames of Judeophobia.

The rise of populist anti-Semitism, as exemplified by Wilhelm Marr's Anti-Semitic League in 1879, was definitely a factor in the consolidation of a new and virulent strain of bigotry defined by racial prejudice. The volkist movement, which Weiss claims had no real equivalent in other Western nations, was a form of racialist anti-Semitism which predated Nazism. Conventional anti-Semites were content to end Jewish civil rights, but volkists demanded that Jews be isolated or destroyed.

As Weiss suggests, volkist ideas permeated the German royal court. When Theodor Herzl asked the Kaiser, Wilhelm II, to use his influence with the Ottoman sultan to create a Jewish state in Palestine, he wrote on the petition how happy he would be to rid Germany of all "Yids." Wilhelm, too, promised to cleanse the army and government of Jews, and often spoke of the coming racial war pitting Aryans against Jews.

Weiss contends that the key to Hitler's accession to power was his ability to connect the welter of anti-Semitic myths to the practical dilemmas of millions of Germans. He argues that it was anti-Semitism that enabled the National Socialists to unite Germans from all segments of society but the left.

He notes that the Holocaust was "not simply a consequence" of World War II, since the destruction of the Jews was a Nazi war aim. But here we must be extremely careful. It is highly debatable whether the Nazis' eliminationist brand of anti-Semitism would have materialized had the war not broken out. Prior to 1941, Hitler's policy of choice, his fire-breathing threats notwithstanding, was to render Jews second-class citizens and drive them out of Germany.

Even Hitler's conservative opponents in the resistance were not immune to anti-Semitism. Some, such as Carl Goerdeler, the former mayor of Leipzig, believed that Jews were too visibly prominent during the Weimar Republic. Anti-Semitism was indeed deeply embedded in Germany, and Ideology and Death expounds on this theme.

Explaining evil

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

Over the years, on the occasions that I have witnessed people pulled into the discussion vortex of "why bad things happen to good people," I have frequently been reminded of a comment made by Immanuel Kant.

He wrote that often, the way people try and simplistically defend God's ways is more scandalous than the question of innocent suffering in the first place.

And so the sophisticated educator may feel like Sisyphus in trying to ascend theodicy's mountain. Because for many Jewish children, the torments of the righteous are the black hole whither the commanding God also disappears, losing His moral right to dictate terms on any level.

Yet it is a very serious theological necessity to maintain that God is good; indeed the whole foundation of religious belief may hinge on that claim.

Clearly, there are times when arguments in theory just do not address living reality. Rabbi Irving Greenberg once expressed the problem of putting hypothesis before actuality: "No statement, theological or otherwise, should be made that would not be credible in the presence of the burning children."

Though Rabbi Greenberg's assertion is a very needed corrective to the confidence of those who might see in Hitler God's instrument of punishment, it too has troubling implications. The statement would place the traditional justification of God's actions on trial before a jury of innocent sufferers.

But can any idea withstand the emotion-charged atmosphere of such a courtroom? If conventional theodicy cannot survive in a forum such as Auschwitz, is it because traditional explanations are wrong, or because to argue them in front of burning children would be the height of callous insensitivity?

Torments of the righteous

Even more troubling is that the Holocaust has become, perhaps inevitably, but no less perversely for all that, the "feel good" story of our age. Recent films and works of literature regarding the Shoah have, one can't help but notice, evinced adjectives such as "beautiful," "provocative," "inspirational."

But gas chambers are not inspirational, and surviving the death camps is not the historical equivalent of the locker room pep talk at half time. How many novels, movies, conferences, courses, fundraisers, art exhibits – how many before the Holocaust has become just another cultural artifact, stripped of its ability to shock, void of its capacity to silence?

The dilemma has its subtleties as well. While it is easy to point a finger at more commercialized renderings of suffering – best captured in the repugnant and yet brutally accurate pun, "there's no business like Shoah business," the hyping of the Holocaust extends to the scholarly domain as well.

The recent controversy concerning Daniel Goldhagen's book, Hitler's Willing Executioners, is not simply academic squabbling over the book's thesis, which universalizes the ordinary German's complicity. It also reflects a certain uneasiness about the Holocaust scholar as media star and charismatic lecturer, commanding high fees and entrancing audiences worldwide (though this too, is nothing new, except perhaps for its scale).

And yet should not such research and subsequent debates reach a large audience? Is the popularity of Holocaust studies the beginning of its ethical dubiousness or evidence of the thirst for its educational relevance?

Students must recognize that we can't simply think our way out of the problem. Evil doesn't become fathomable just because we apply some philosophical categories or historical perspectives to try and explain it. Because when human beings try to "explain evil," the next temptation is to "understand." And that which can be understood can be forgiven.

Holiday fun 'n games

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

The seders are over, but there are still a few days left before the kids go back to school. So here are some sites on the Jewish Highway that will entertain, challenge and even educate vacationing children (and adults too). Please note, that some of these sites require Java friendly browsers such as Netscape 4.5 [http://home.netscape.com/download/index.html] or Internet Explorer 4.5 [http://www.microsoft.com/windows/ie/download/].

I particularly liked the Zigzag Jewish game site [http://www.zigzagworld.com/games.htm]. AlefBetGo challenges you to a Hebrew alphabet game. (It's much harder than it sounds.)

A Picnic with Friends isn't actually a game but a way to learn some Hebrew words while you create a picture. You are shown a country scene and if you click on the Hebrew word "nemala" you can drag an ant into the picture. You can do more Hebrew learning and decorating in Around the House [http://www.zigzagworld.com/ah/ah.html].

Is there a budding artist in the family? The Pirchei site has several large coloring books on Jewish themes such as ones on Birkat Hamazon and Pirkei Avot [http://www.pirchei.co.il/pictoral] while Shema Yisrael's coloring books focus on Jewish Holidays [http://www.shemayisrael.co.il/eishes_chayil/private/yomtov/coloring.htm].

The Melton Research Centre uses a game to teach one of the Rambam's most famous and important lessons: The Eight Levels of Tzedakah [http://www.jtsa.edu/melton/tzedakah/ladder/game/]. Roots and Me will quiz you about the Jewish calendar [http://www.rootsandme.org.il/just.html] or challenge you to learn more about the Jewish history of your corner of the world [http://www.rootsandme.org.il/home.html].

At the Jewish Fun Page, you try to figure out some jumbled Jewish words and some (groaner) jokes [http://www.geocities.com/Enchanted Forest/Dell/4430/jewishfunpage.htm].

(Question: Which burn longer, Shabbat candles or yom tov candles? Answer: None, they both burn shorter.)

If you want more games, puzzles and stories, try the Jewish Children's Web site Guide [http://www. geocities.com/Heartland/Plains/7613/] and Children's Judaica [http://members.tripod.com/~ProudMommy/torah.html].

One of my favorite sites is Rafi Stern's Fun Trail [http://members.tripod.com/~rafistern/puzzle.html]. You can play the Aleph-Bet memory game (similar to the TV game show Concentration) or create a ridiculous poem with the Random Poetry Generator.

Remember those hand-held puzzles in which you try to rearrange the tiles to create a picture, or put the alphabet in order? That game has gone high-tech and now you can do the same virtual puzzle right on your screen [http://members.tripod.com/~rafistern/puzzleboard.html].

Well, don't just sit there. Get clicking!

Jewish quotations

Two Jews, Three Opinions.* A Collection of Twentieth-Century American Jewish Quotations, edited by S. Brawarsky and D. Mark (Penguin, $34.99).

This giant compendium of Jewish quotations is different from most: it is intentionally limited to one century and one continent.

Books
Bernard Baskin

It is the inspiration of two New York City women, voracious readers who culled material from hundreds of books, newspapers, magazines, speeches, sermons and letters. What resulted was a cornucopia of 3,000 quotations, such as those that follow:

• I think the two greatest contributions of Judaism to the world are the values of justice and compassion ... the quest to balance these values has been the overarching theme of Jewish life. And what I find especially impressive is that justice is not the natural human condition. Power is. Revenge is much more natural than justice. – Alan M. Dershowitz, law professor.

• There is no commandment to hate the enemy in any Jewish source I have ever read or heard of. Christian polemics frequently make Jewish "justice" into "vengeance." When in 1961 the most horrendous criminal ever to be tried by a Jewish court was brought for trial to Jerusalem, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation featured a nationwide television program. It was entitled: The Eichman Trial – Justice or Vengeance? – Emil L. Fackenheim, professor of philosophy.

• My grandfather was born in Jerusalem, my father was born in Yugoslavia, my mother in Bulgaria. I was born in Greece, my wife in Germany, my son in Israel, and my daughter in America. This is what it is to be a Jew. – Unnamed man at a gathering of Holocaust survivors from Greece.

• You've got to be very close to God, you have to know Him very well to blaspheme Him. Only a deeply religious person can despise God, shake his fist at God and abuse Him. A blaspheming Jew is a believing Jew. And the camps were composed of these Jews in great numbers ... being an atheist in the camp was no easy thing. – Holocaust survivor who worked on clearance of the gas chamber.

• After Auschwitz belief in God may be difficult, but belief in man is impossible. – Dennis Prager.

• Wherever I may die, let me be buried not among the rich and famous but among plain Jewish people, the workers, the common folk, so that my tombstone may honor the simple graves around me, and the simple graves honor mine. ... The best monument for me will be if my books are read. – Shalom Aleichem, from his Ethical Will to his Family.

• A religious person doesn't "believe" in God, he has faith in God. One's relation to God is existential, not rational ... Pure reason will never get you beyond pure reason. But the more you pray, the more likely you are to have faith. That is why children are taught to pray, rather than being instructed in "proofs" of God's existence." – Irving Kristol, social critic, editor, and publisher.

• With a broad hint that the "Era of Moshiach" is upon us, the Lubavitch advertisers invite us to jump on the bandwagon, and "Be part of it!" Both religion and politics are trivialized by this manipulation of hope. Jews have maintained their disciplined religious civilization too long through too much painful history for it to be degraded by such cheapened rhetoric. – Ruth R. Wisse, professor of Yiddish and comparative literature.

• Who could have believed back in June 1967 that 30 years later Jews would be verbally and physically accosting each other over the right to pray by the Western Wall? – Joseph, R. Rackman, attorney and columnist.

• Without human participation, God remains incomplete, unrealized. It is up to us to actualize the divine potential in the world. God needs us. – Daniel C. Matt.

• I came into the world as a Jew and I want to leave it as a Jew. – Felix Frankfurter, justice of the United States Supreme Court; quoted by a former law clerk who said Kaddish at his funeral.

Real justice denied

By GREGG RICKMAN

If there was a lesson the world should have learned from the experiences of Switzerland over the past three years, that would be to think before one talks. Yet, in forgetting the recent past, the German chancellor has condemned himself to repeat it.

In announcing government backing for a humanitarian compensation fund backed by 12 German companies, to ostensibly settle slave labor lawsuits against them in U.S. courts, Gerhard Schröder declared one of the goals of the initiative was to "establish a basis to confront complaints, in particular class actions in the United States, and to destabilize campaigns against the reputation of our country and its economy."

Weak in his commitment to justice, Schröder has committed the same error Swiss officials did when confronted with similar claims against Switzerland seeking compensation for Swiss financial collaboration with the Nazis.

One would have thought that after three years of searing and unceasing attacks on Switzerland and its banks, the heirs to the perpetrators of the Holocaust would have learned a thing or two. Instead of reacting with emotion and disdain, one should act with reticence. Instead of appearing as stubbornly legalistic misers wishing to hold onto ill-gotten gain, one should act with generosity and repentance. Unfortunately, the Germans chose to conduct their game plan using the Swiss play book. They chose wrong.

Just as Swiss officials repeatedly hurt their own cause, they hurt the survivors' as well. Equally, Chancellor Schröder's ill-tempered and poorly chosen words do more harm than good for the cause he ostensibly espouses, namely justice for survivors. His words evoke dark visions of a conspiracy against Germany.

Germany's reputation and honor are at stake, if one is to believe the chancellor. Adolf Hitler also proclaimed Germany to be the target of a campaign and an effort to deprive the state of its rightful place in the world.

Schröder has committed a sin with these words. His sin is neither against the claimants nor the lawyers who represent them, but against history and memory. For a German chancellor, 50 years after the end of World War II, to declare Germany to be the target of a "campaign," is an unjustifiable act only giving credence to Hitler's twisted visions.

Are we to assume Schröder's words were simply ill-chosen? Were that true, he should have already realized the mistake and apologized. Unfortunately, he has not done so.

Following the recent Swiss example of statecraft is hardly a wise choice. If Schröder wishes to do so, then implicit with this choice is the treatment this ill-suited diplomacy deserves. Just as Switzerland was treated like an outcast around the world because of its abhorrent behavior, these remarks might well encourage those seeking retribution against Germany to pursue similar measures.

Germany has a special place in history for the evil it espoused and the genocide it carried out. If Schröder wishes to end the century reminding the world that Germany has not learned from the mistakes of the not so distant past, then so be it.

If however, he wishes to show the world there is indeed a new Germany, he should repudiate these horrible words and get on with the business of providing real and meaningful justice to the slave laborers who live their lives 50 years after the war, still uncompensated, and haunted by the Holocaust and their mistreatment at the hands of German companies complicit with the Nazis.

Torah ark dedicated at home for the aged

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO – More than 50 residents and family members attended the dedication of an ark at the Shalom Congregation, located at Castleview Wychwood Towers, the largest facility run by Toronto Homes for the Aged.

The non-sectarian chapel at Castleview Wychwood becomes a Jewish synagogue during times of Jewish worship – Shabbat morning services, all major Jewish holidays and special events.

Rabbi Ronald Weiss, director of Chaplaincy Services for the Jewish Family and Child Service (JF&CS), led the dedication service with lay leaders, Lori and Ernie Gershon.

Rabbi Weiss spoke of the importance of having a Jewish facility available to Jewish residents and their families.

The oak carved ark, which looks like tablets of law, was crafted by professional cabinet maker Bruce Hodge in honor of his mother who was at Castleview Wychwood. The ark, donated by resident Goldie Shore's family, is adorned by fabric-art hangings. They were donated by the families of Alex Chernick and Molly and Morris Grover, in their memory.

Mounted on Plexiglas, the vibrant-colored fabric art, painted silk decorated with embroidery and beading, depicts scenes of what the Hebrews saw as they entered the land of Canaan.

The ner tamid is an abstract sun and contains the word zachor, which means remember. The wall hangings depict the seven agricultural species of Israel mentioned in the Torah.

Ernie Gershon noted that Jewish residents from two floors were unable to attend as those floors were closed for safety reasons. He thanked the residents' families, noting that it is "families' own participation that keeps the congregation vital."

The Shabbat service leaders who were recognized included, Paula Warren, Diane Saxxe, Janet and Israel Horowitz, Ron Weisfeld, the Gershons, and Bill Kelly, who was also cited for his extraordinary service at Castleview Wychwood. Kelly was recently honored as the Ontario volunteer of the year.

The Bloor Jewish Community Centre and chaplaincy at JF&CS assist the congregation for the holidays.

Programming expands for Russian community

By MILA KLETSKY
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — This city's Russian Jewish community is expanding rapidly.

In order to make it easier for the immigrants to integrate into their new country and into the Jewish community, a number of events have been arranged. Recently, a Judaic studies seminar for Russian speaking immigrants was organized by Congregation Ma'on Noam and Ameinu, an association of parents and teachers at Beth Jacob school. It was held at Congregation B'nai Torah.

The seminar was the brainchild of Rabbi Hirsch Rabiski of Congregation Ma'on Noam, who also leads Judaic studies and Hebrew classes. It was run by Russian and Canadian volunteers, some of whom are students of Rabbi Rabiski. Seminar topics included Kabballah, Passover, the mystery of female/ male relationships, and kosher food. Speakers included Prof. Alexandr Poltorak and his wife Leah, from Monsey, N.Y., and Rabbi Rabiski.

The seminar attracted more than 100 people, some of them atheists who were skeptical about how Judaism could help people cope with their daily lives.

Rabbi Rabiski said, however, that "it is sometimes easier to reconvince some atheists because they are at least believers in something, [rather] than people who have no faith at all in anything in the world."

The Poltorak family came to Judaism through their study of physics. The search for the source of life in the universe, said Poltorak, and extensive research and lots of doubts and problems, "in the end brought us to God."

The Poltoraks met Rabbi Rabiski in Italy 17 years ago, and they credit him with helping them understand Judaism.

itzhak Troyb, who attended the seminar with his wife Lilly and their three children, said he is convinced that learning about experiences such as those of the Poltoraks can be helpful to Russian Jews. He and his wife had a similar experience, he said, and so did many other Russian Jews.

Others who still are in search of the meaning of life would keep their minds open and trust what they hear because people such as Poltorak speak the same language in the wide sense of the word, and are well aware of what the audience will accept and how to explain the unclear topics, Troyb said.

Another seminar participant, who was visiting from Israel, said that such events help people open their minds and souls to the spiritual life initially given to the Jews.

The seminar included babysitting, children's activities, and lunch. Among the discussion leaders were Chaia Fleisher and Irena Petrini.

Organizers knew the day was a success, because before people left, they asked the date of the next event.

Sunnybrook holds seder for veterans

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — One of the largest institutional seders in Canada was held on March 29, at the Jewish Chapel at Sunnybrook and Women's College Health Science Centre.

The seder for Jewish veterans was attended by 175 people, many of them relatives and friends of the veterans.

"It was held on a Monday instead of the regular seder days to allow relatives and friends to attend this and their own family seders," said Michael Earle, an officer of the chapel.

Attended by 175 people

The seder was led by Rabbi Barry Schneider of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, who is spiritual adviser and chaplain to Sunnybrook Jewish Chapel. Also active in the seder arrangements was Reverend Bob Hunt, coordinator of pastoral services at the hospital.

Among those attending were Ralph Snow, chapel president; David Smuschowitz, vice-president; and Leslie Dan, chair of the Leslie and Judy Dan Foundation.

The Sunnybrook Jewish Chapel is the first synagogue to be built in a hospital in North America.

Jewish seniors plan singles group for peers

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A local widow and widower say the community offers no organized programs for Jewish singles aged 55 to 70, so they're hoping to start something on their own.

"This age group is just not represented," bemoans Olga Verrall, 62, who's been a widow for seven years. "There are a lot of lonely people out there."

Verrall and Newton Markus, a 67-year-old widower, are hoping to start a Jewish social group, preferably led by a volunteer, for older people who are divorced, whose spouses have died, or have never married.

Verrall says she has approached synagogues and community facilities with the idea, but has been turned down. "I can't understand why the Jewish community has not been more helpful or understanding," she says.

There's no shortage of Jewish singles and dating services out there, but the singles groups are for younger people, "and we don't want a dating service," Verrall says.

'Don't want a dating service'

As for existing clubs and groups for older people, "the idea is to play cards or go on outings to casinos. That's not my idea of entertainment. We're looking for something on a higher level."

A group called Widows or Widowers (WOW), which runs some programs, didn't appeal to Verrall and her friends because she felt it focused too much on coping with loss.

She and Markus stress they're not seeking community dollars, but rather, interested people, and perhaps for a synagogue to donate space for a monthly meeting.

Singles in this age group have unique needs, they add. Many are still coping with the death of their spouse, or with divorce later in their marriages. "I have many friends, but they are all married," Verrall says. "And our children have their own lives. It's a real problem."

She and Markus have already assembled a core group of 12 to 15 people who go out to dinner, but they say they need at least 40 people to do the kind of programming they want, such as cruises and long walks.

They're certain there are hundreds of Jewish singles in Toronto between 55 and 70.

Those interested may contact Verrall at 736-6776.

Yiddish language of pre-war Warsaw Jews explored

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A Warsaw University professor expressed regret that no serious effort is being made to preserve the record of the Yiddish language as it was spoken by Warsaw Jews before the Holocaust.

"I made my first tapings of Yiddish as it was spoken in Warsaw before the war 17 years ago, but now it is getting harder and harder to find such people because they are dying off," said Dr. Ewa Geller, associate professor of German and Yiddish, at a well-attended meeting at Holy Blossom Temple sponsored by the Polish-Jewish Heritage Foundation.

The Yiddish language is the only aspect of Jewish culture in Warsaw that is not being properly commemorated, she said.

The failure to preserve Yiddish as it was spoken deprives 330,000 Warsaw Jews of legitimacy, Geller said, adding that the melody of the language is now "alien" to Jews in Poland born after the Holocaust.

In 1943, she said, Warsaw was a multilingual city, with one out of every four speakers using Yiddish, making it the second most used language.

"Yiddish was in every corner of the Jewish quarter, especially in the noisy markets. There are not enough survivors to protect the memory of those who died."

However, a new Yiddish language is emerging in Poland as a result of academic research and summer school classes attended by non-Jews, she said.

The Yiddish spoken in Warsaw before the Holocaust was more than a dialect, successfully incorporating the dialects of Jews from other parts of eastern Europe, but it was not used by the upper classes of Jews who tended to speak German or Polish, she contended. Her research shows that Yiddish was used by the working classes in Warsaw.

"Warsaw Yiddish never succeeded as the major courier of Yiddish culture," she said, blaming this to some extent on the negative views of Warsaw culture expressed by writers like the Singer brothers who settled in New York.

Her contention that the Yiddish spoken by Warsaw Jews was a "vernacular, sloppy and with broad pronunciation," which never penetrated popular Polish culture, was challenged in the discussion period by Aaron Fainer, a Warsaw survivor.

Asked if she had ever investigated whether Yiddish continuity could be traced through the Yeshivot then existing in Poland, Geller said that as a woman, she was not allowed to enter the Yeshivot to pursue this research.

Although essentially negative about the future of Yiddish as an every day language, during the discussion period, Geller agreed with Gerry Kane, a former president of Friends of Yiddish, that it is necessary to support Yiddish studies at the University of Toronto and York University.

"The same support that is being put into rabbinic studies is not being put into Yiddish," Kane said.

Piotr Wrobel, professor of Polish history at the University of Toronto, chaired the meeting.

Jail for white supremacist, as court reverses decision

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Ontario Court of Appeal has reversed a conditional sentence that was imposed on a white supremacist, and instead sent him to jail for 12 months.

The Appeal Court ruled that Ontario Court (Provincial Division) judge Mary Hogan erred last April when she ignored the danger Quinn McFarlane posed to the community, and when she did not solicit the Crown's views on a conditional sentence.

"In our view, this unprovoked assault committed by an offender who has exhibited a history of violence, clearly calls for denunciation," the Appeal Court ruled.

In imposing the jail sentence, the court noted that McFarlane had a lengthy criminal record, including eight assault convictions. At the time of the attack in question, McFarlane was on probation after he had served time for assault with a weapon.

In June 1998, after receiving the conditional discharge, McFarlane was sentenced to 18 months in jail for an earlier racist assault on a black man as well as on the two arresting police officers.

Two years ago, McFarlane was one of a handful of demonstrators outside a Toronto motel protesting the presence in Canada of Roma (Gypsy) refugees.

'Assault unprovoked'

The incident that led to McFarlane's latest period of incarceration occurred outside the court at 361 University Ave. in downtown Toronto. McFarlane viciously slugged a reporter going to the aid of a television cameraman that McFarlane was assaulting. The cameraman was filming a skinhead who was on trial for yet another offence.

"His assault of the victim was unprovoked and was unwarranted," the court found.

Evidence at McFarlane's trial showed he had been associated "with groups espousing white supremacist views and which advocate group violence as part of their identity," the court stated.

Bernie Farber, executive director of Canadian Jewish Congress' Ontario region, testified at McFarlane's trial about white supremacist groups. He was stunned when Hogan, as part of McFarlane's sentence, ordered him to receive counselling from Farber.

"It took me by surprise. It was nothing that I had offered," Farber said.

At the time, he agreed to talk to McFarlane if he felt the white supremacist was sincere in changing his ways.

But, since the conditional sentence was imposed in April 1998, Farber hasn't heard from McFarlane. "I don't think it was a serious consideration by him," he said.

"I thought the original sentence was wholly inadequate, given his record and his association with white supremacist groups," he added.

Concordia students fight 'anti-Semitic' campaign

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Jewish students at Concordia University are trying to deal with what they allege is a renewed campaign by pro-Palestinian students to target Israel and Jews.

As a result, Jewish students who wear kippot are being made to feel "vulnerable," according to Concordia Hillel president Geremy Miller.

The students also accuse the Concordia administration, which helps to fund the campus-based Palestinian group, of doing nothing to address what they feel are propaganda attacks against Jews.

"Concordia is giving money to something that is blantantly anti-Semitic," said Andrew Elbaz, city-wide president of the Hillel Jewish Student Centre.

Elbaz said that material distributed by the Palestinian student group – called the Concordia Collective for Palestinian Human Rights (CCPHR) – has included Holocaust denial material and references to, "Jews," interchangeably with "Israelis" and "Zionists."

What brought the issue to a head, was the appearance at Concordia on March 12 – a Friday night – of controversial political science professor Norman Finkelstein of Hunter college in New York, as part of the Palestine Awareness Week based at McGill University.

Finkelstein, himself the son of Holocaust survivors, has been criticised by Jewish organizations for comparing the Israeli treatment of Palestinians to the Nazis' persecution of Jews, and for saying that a Holocaust studies "industry" was created to deflect attention away from that treatment.

Lecture scheduled for Friday night

Finkelstein's lecture, as Shabbat began, prompted more than 100 students from Hillel campuses across the city to spend Friday evening singing, eating Shabbat dinner and dancing upstairs from where Finkelstein was speaking – at Concordia's downtown Hall Building's mezzanine level.

Press reports quoted Finkelstein as expressing regret in his lecture that observant Jewish students could not attend his talk, which was unavoidably scheduled for a Friday night.

For Miller, the increased level of Palestinian activity on campus this year, marked the end of a lull that followed several years of antagonism between Palestinian and Jewish students on campus, dating back to the beginning of the Palestinian intifadah at the end of 1987.

Miller said the CCPHR spent the last year distributing an "unbelievable" amount of literature on campus, focusing on "human rights" issues.

Some of the material included accusations of "Jews" poisoning Palestinian wells, but virtually none of the material, Miller said, spoke about violations of Palestinian rights outside the territories.

Miller said what he found particularly disturbing, was that the CCPHR did not seem to recognize the Palestinian Authority, and seemed more in line ideologically with completely rejectionist groups such as Hamas.

At first, he said, the attitude at Concordia Hillel was to ignore the CCPHR, so as not to lend them publicity or credibility.

"But it came to a point where we could no longer just sit there," Miller said.

"The [Concordia] administration is afraid of repercussions, so they refuse to do anything, and say it's a free speech issue.

"But a lot of Jewish students feel unsafe. It's creating an unsafe environment. Jewish students are being singled out, and that's unacceptable on a university campus."

When Miller first learned in February of Finkelstein's scheduled appearance, Hillel students consulted with Concordia professor Frederick Krantz and with Rabbi Reuben Poupko, both of the Canadian Institute for Jewish Research.

As a result of those discussions, Miller said, it was decided that any form of public "protest" would prove ineffectual and that Jewish students' interests would be better served by holding the Friday night event and countering Palestinian disinformation with facts, so that Jewish students themelves would be armed with a more accurate picture of reality, and not be at risk of being taken in by CCPHR propaganda.

Miller said that a small number of Jewish students at Concordia has since formed a group called Jewish Students for Israeli Pride with that goal in mind, and in an effort to revive a spark of activism among them.

In Miller's view, some Jewish students are uninformed about issues relating to the Middle East conflict and too easily fall victim to the Palestinian propaganda onslaught.

He said that while many Jewish students may agree and others may disagree over Israeli government policies vis-a-vis the Palestinians, Jewish students are unanimous in their general support of Israel as an entity with every right to exist.

He said Jewish students, "can no longer stand by and know only half the facts."

Coast to Coast

Proposed project may derail Holocaust museum

Ronen said lobbying for a genocide museum was being orchestrated by individuals who cannot tolerate the notion that the Holocaust was a form of genocide unlike any other, and that it is unique in history in "terms of the size and scope of its murderous agenda."

Sol Littman, Canadian representative of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre, said he believes CFAGM is being manipulated by Gregorovich to "stymie" construction of a Holocaust museum.

"Gregorovich is no fool. He's trying to create something that is at least plausible. His outlook is almost one of 'issue envy'. Jews have a Holocaust, he wants to highlight the Ukrainian famine. The Japanese were interned during World War II, he wants to raise the issue of Ukrainians interned during World War I. He's really intent on portraying Ukrainians as victims."

During the Deschenes Commission inquiry into Nazi war criminals in Canada, Gregorovich was heavily involved in countering what he saw as misrepresentations of the Ukrainian role on the side of the Nazis during World War II.

Gregorovich rejects suggestions that a genocide museum would come at the expense of a Holocaust museum, though "the killing of Jews in Europe would naturally be part of a genocide museum."

He said a solution could be the construction of two museums. "We want a genocide museum,but we recognize that the Jewish community wants a Holocaust museum, and that it's appropriate for them to lobby for it...The Jewish community feels it's such a special case that it shouldn't be included with other genocides, as it would detract from [the Holocaust]."

Gregorovich suggested the federal government would have to decide whether to create two museums, or one museum with two wings. "The government, perhaps, should go ahead with both museums. We don't have a position against that."

Ronen said Congress is not against two state-supported facilities, saying it is conceivable that Ottawa could back both projects.

"We didn't start the debate," he said. "The government has started to work on the Holocaust museum and the opponents started to derail the process by manipulating people into supporting a generic museum."

Robyn Serbyn disagrees.

A professor of history at the Universite du Quebec a Montreal, Serbyn is involved in the lobbying effort for a genocide museum, though he is not part of Gregorovich's group.

He said, that while he recognized the "unique" nature of the Shoah, other genocides, from the victims' point of view, are unique in their own respects.

"I have no problem with the concept of uniqueness," Serbyn said, "but that does not prevent having a genocide museum, with each community [that has suffered genocide] showing its uniqueness as it relates to the genocide experience."

Unlike Ronen and Gregorovich, however, Serbyn opposed the idea of two government-supported museums. That would amount to a "two-tiered approach" in which one genocide, the Holocaust, "stands on its own, while the others are grouped together," almost as if they were "second class."

"People would not be united in this," he said. "It would be divisive."

That's also a position taken by the UCC, an umbrella organization that claims to speak for one million Canadians of Ukrainian descent. Adrian Boyko, first vice-president of the UCC, said "we believe a museum dedicated to all the victims of genocide would be a noble and dignified way for Canada to commemorate genocide.

"What we're afraid of is that we don't want to create divisions within Canadian society when there are many people inside Canada who've suffered millions of losses. We say a description of genocide where a main part would be the Holocaust would be a binding force in Canada, not divisive."

In an information pamphlet on the genocide museum, Serbyn argues that a museum devoted to genocide against Jews, Gypsies, Cambodians, Ukrainians and others would be an invaluable educational tool for young Canadians.

"It would not be proper," he writes, "for Canada to single out one genocide for study or one group of victims for public national remembrance, while neglecting the others. Canadian survivors of all genocides must be recognized."

Gregorovich said CFAGM has embarked on a letter-writing campaign directed at MPs and senators, as the group tries to solicit political support for a genocide museum.

(Liberal MP Sarkis Assadourian has tabled a private members bill calling on the Canadian Museum of Civilization to mount, within two years, an exhibit "that recognized the crimes against humanity perpetrated during the 20th century.")

A letter sent from Gregorovich to an MP states that "if a museum housing only one Canadian community's story of genocide was being built with the support of the Canadian taxpayer, then it should be on the subjects of the genocide to which our First Peoples were subjected."

Palestine Heritage Canada waded into the issue with a letter that states the term Holocaust is "exclusive of all others who suffered from genocide during that war, or indeed, from all genocides committed before or since.

"PHC believes the Jewish experience with genocide during the Second World War is deserving of presentations. However, PHC also believes there is no such thing as a hierarchy of genocides. Many other experiences with genocides are no less deserving of such government attention and support."

Prutschi said Congress' position is clear. "The government must meet its commitment to establish a Canadian Holocaust Museum in Ottawa. That commitment has already been made, but we support the creation of another facility that recognized other crimes against humanity."

McMaster dedicates lounge to late MJSA director

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — The McMaster Jewish Students Association (MJSA) recently unveiled a plaque dedicating its lounge to the memory of Sheila Freedman, and officially launched the Sheila Freedman Endowment Fund.

Freedman, who died of cancer last fall, had been the MJSA director for over 15 years. She was dedicated to the welfare of her students and to providing them with a Jewish home away from home.

The students themselves decided to start a fund and to dedicate their lounge in Freedman's memory, said Judy Schwartz, the new MJSA director.

Proceeds from the fund, which will be held within the Legacy Endowment Fund of the Jewish Federation of Hamilton-Wentworth, will be used for religious study projects.

Freedman, who for many years also taught at Beth Jacob Religious School, returned to university some years ago and would have graduated this year with a degree in religious studies. Her degree, said Schwartz, will be awarded posthumously.

Approximately 60 people crowded into the small basement lounge in the Commons Building: students, former students, parents of students, family members, friends and community leaders, including Rabbi Zalman Itkin, director of the Chabad Jewish Student Centre and Rabbi Irwin Zeplowitz of Temple Anshe Sholom.

Brenda Pinkus, a McMaster University student from 1982 to 1986, said Freedman "was always interested in our well-being. She advised us, guided us, comforted us, debated with us, and humored us like a fellow student."

Pinkus said that although she initially resisted joining, she found that "the MJSA offered a welcoming opportunity for Jewish connection."

It was Freedman's "unselfishness," she said, that "contributed to the success of this organization."

Fighting tears, Freedman's daughter Amy, recalled her mother's constant concern for the students, and the dedication she had brought to her job.

Other tributes were from MJSA co-presidents Monika Roseman and Dan Kobrick, federation president Cheryl Greenbaum, and Schwartz, who described Freedman as a woman of valor.

Conference examines franco-Jewish relations

Quebecers to look at their history from a perspective other than the defence of French in North America. There is a fascination, he said, with how other minorities view their experience here.

"A gradual realization is dawning that the notion of who is a Québécois has to be enlarged to include everyone residing here," he said.

David Bensoussan, a francophone executive member of Canadian Jewish Congress, contrasted the relative openness of English Canada with the "cultural exclusivity" of Quebec.

He suggested that attempts at dialogue between francophones and Jews have been hampered by a history of anti-Semitism among the clergy and certain nationalist circles, a legacy which modern Quebecers have done little to "soften."

The "excess of nationalism" of the separatist movement and of the language laws have not encouraged a climate of rapprochement and Quebec remains essentially a society of "two solitudes," Bensoussan said.

If Quebec nationalists do not modify their image of exclusivity, he said, they risk losing out on the opportunity for better relations with minorities who are more attracted to the the image of tolerance projected by the rest of Canada and the United States.

Ira Robinson, a Jewish studies professor at Concordia University, said the relationship between Jews and French Quebecers was "a dialogue of the deaf" until the 1960s, and it still has a long way to go to be meaningful.

The image of Jews among French-Canadians was marked by two "myths:" that the Jews are among the "English persecutors" and that they are "the sinister other," which is the enemy of Christian civilization, he said.

For their part, Jews' feelings towards Quebecers were colored by 2,000 years of anti-Semitism in Christian society, Robinson said. "As well, Jews were conscious of French-Canadian nationalism and remembered other nationalisms that had refused to accept them on an equal footing and completely excluded them."

While much has changed since the '60s, Robinson warned that, if a true dialogue is to take place, "a new mode for discussion and understanding" must be found.

"The real problem is that often our dialogues and our goodwill stay at their beginning. If we read the history of these dialogues, we note that, for the most part, we speak of many beginnings and not of real progress," Robinson said.

He observed "with sadness" that Esther Delisle's controversial writings on historical anti-Semitism and right-wing extremism have "poisoned and politicized the atmosphere," he said.

"Whatever the merits or faults of Esther Delisle's research, the veritable explosion of controversy around her book and its reception in Quebec and Canada achieved the result of annulling much of the results of these promising beginnings for several years."

Many Quebecers take it as a "collective insult" to associate the affirmation of French with Nazism, he said.

Robinson called for greater collaboration between anglophone and francophone intellectuals interested in Quebec Jewry.

"The challenge for all of us is to increase the means of communication in order that Quebec Jewish studies can avoid the multiple marginalizations of the past and develop as an integral part of Quebec, Canadian and Jewish studies."

Both groups were new to the city

Anctil, a founder of Dialogue St. Urbain, an ongoing dialogue group between Jews and French Quebecers, stressed the commonality of experience the two communities in Montreal shared during the early part of this century.

Both groups were new to the city. The Jews were European immigrants, while French Quebecers had migrated from the countryside.

Despite the attention that has been given to anti-Semitism, Anctil believes the two communities enjoyed harmonious relations at the "street" level, and that this can be the basis for linkages today.

Workers and small shopkeepers and their customers got along fine, while the professional and intellectual class tended to ignore, or worse, openly oppose the Jewish presence in Quebec, he said.

"Part of the francophone elite fought the Jewish presence in Quebec, considering Jews as enemies of the Church and as followers of left-wing and secular ideological forces."

Anctil proposed the twinning of institutions, the initiation of joint cultural projects and even the establishment of a Jewish museum, as means of strengthening relations between the two communities.

One man's strenuous objection to Delisle's April 22 lecture sponsored by the JPL, and the promotion of that event in a JPL newsletter distributed at the conference, illustrated just how sensitive relations between the Jews and French Quebecers remain.

Referring to Delisle's latest book, Myths, Memories & Lies: Quebec's Intelligentsia and the Fascist Temptation, 1939-1960, the newsletter says, "The young sovereignists of the 1960s have attempted to hide this recent past and deny their involvement with these movements, but these very people are the architects of Quebec's 'official memories,' or, perhaps, its 'official silence'."

JPL president Peter Jacobs emphasized that the library sponsors lectures by persons of a wide variety of views and seeks to be a forum for open discussion.

Museum exhibit explores Jewish women of Saint John

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When Charlotte Koven Feldbloom tells people she's from Saint John, New Brunswick, she is sometimes asked, "You mean there were Jews out there?"

The question triggers a rush of pride as she recalls the "dynamic, creative and fully Jewish life" she enjoyed growing up there, she said recently.

At a reception for the opening of the Beth Tzedec Reuben and Helene Dennis Museum's current exhibit – The Image of Jewish Women in Saint John, New Brunswick, 1897-1997 – Koven Feldbloom said how proud she was of her mother Marcia Koven, "who took it upon herself to try to preserve some of [the Saint John Jewish community's] rich history."

Koven, the driving force behind the Saint John Jewish Historical Museum, was at home recovering from a broken leg.

Dorion Liebgott, museum curator, first contacted Koven after hearing an interview with Peter Gzowski on CBC Radio. Liebgott was so enthused she called Koven that same afternoon.

The photos in the display – assembled by Craig Chouinard, a former summer docent of the museum – are very evocative, said Koven Feldbloom, who is assistant principal at Temple Sinai Synagogue School.

Her memories of Canadian Young Judaea meetings and conferences, building sukkot in the woods and attending Hebrew school are "only the tip of a very rich iceberg, for the glory days of Saint John were unfolding long before I was even conscious of them," Koven Feldbloom said.

Sandy Brown, a past president of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto (now UJA Federation), spoke of the lasting influence of growing up Jewish in Saint John.

"This richness of our heritage has played into our identity as Jewish people," she said. "While we have become part of another place, we have contributed to our new place because we had such a rich connection to the past.

"All of us who have left there still feel connected," Brown said. Her words were born out by the presence of 200 or so former Saint John residents, now living in and near Toronto.

Brown co-sponsored the opening reception in memory of her mother Celia Tanzman, who started Saint John's Jewish preschool and was instrumental in setting up a Jewish library.

Unbeknownst to Brown, Ida Starkman – whose father, Rabbi Moses Beshkin, served the community in the 1930s – had carefully preserved a tiny jacket crocheted by Brown's mother some 60 years ago. All the males in Starkman's family, including a recent newborn in Australia, have worn it for their brit, she said, displaying the delicate handiwork.

"Growing up in Saint John was a wonderful experience...You couldn't get lost as a Jew there. Everybody participated," said Karen Miller, recalling the community of about 175 Jewish families. Miller co-sponsored the reception to honor her mother, Ethel Shepherd.

The exhibit includes photos, documents and a 25-foot mural, Mishpucha, created by Belarie Hyman Zatzman and Suzanne Caines with campers at Camp Kadimah in Nova Scotia.

The project began with a letter to parents requesting a photograph of a parent, grandparent or great-grandparent, along with a story, said Hyman Zatzman, associate professor and co-chair of York University's Department of Fine Arts at Atkinson College.

Ida Starkman, left, holds a baby jacket worn by all the males in her family over the past 60 years. The Saint John, N.B. memento was crocheted by the mother of Sandy Brown, right. [Frances Kraft photo]

The mural explores Jewish identity, interweaving stories and photos and providing an intergenerational connection, said Hyman Zatzman.

At the exhibit, Adam Mogelonsky, 13, found pictures of Jenny Brownberg, his paternal great-grandmother.

Adam's father Larry, a native of Montreal who moved here in 1977, used to spend his summers in Saint John. "I never saw any of these pictures," he said, after spotting his grandmother on the invitation. "It's very impressive that they're able to bring all this material together."

The exhibit dates back to January, 1899, when the community formed the Daughters of Israel "to help the needy and nourish the sick." A significant portion of the organization's work involved helping Jewish immigrants from Eastern Europe.

Other highlights of the exhibit include a Salvation Army receipt for $7 made out to the Daughters of Israel for hospital fees, and the 1922 ketubah of Clara Goldfeather and Mitchell Bernstein, whose granddaughter, Janie Sue Bernstein Bale, was one of several family members in attendance.

Among the more recent items is a 1972 Hadassah-WIZO bazaar picture. "I remember that," said Michael Meltzer. "I was 9. My mom was very much involved in putting on this bazaar. I helped out, selling."

"These women are my inspiration. There's no question about it," said Koven Feldbloom, after viewing the exhibit. "They had imagination, creativity, dedication, energy and commitment."

The exhibit runs until May 28.

Walking in the footsteps of our ancestors

By MONA PAUL
Special to The CJN

Israel has been the spiritual home of the Jewish people for over 3,000 years. It is our homeland, our refuge, and the wellspring of our faith. For many of us in the Diaspora, it is the ultimate vacation destination, a giant playground with something for everyone.

Feature

Recently, I travelled to Israel as part of a group of women students with Hebrew and Bible teacher, Channa Sargon. For most of us, the difficulties of leaving husbands, families, jobs and carpools for 10 days made us more than ready to have a good time. Although Bible study was meant to be an important part of the trip, it wasn't, initially, foremost in our minds. As we anticipated, this did turn out to be the vacation of a lifetime, but the touring, entertainment and shopping were only a small part of it. The joy of learning together in the land where our people began was what moved us to sing and dance and laugh and cry.

Abraham established a living connection to the land that God showed him, like a tree deeply rooted in its soil. His descendants, though often blown far afield, have always found their way back to their native ground.

From the early days of wandering, God was an easily perceived presence. The patriarchs used the stones of the land to build altars, and these became a measure of permanence in their nomadic existence. However, from the time they went to Egypt until the giving of the Torah, the link to their land became a tenuous one.

Throughout the centuries that followed, our religious practice became primarily focused on sacrifice and pilgrimage until the destruction of the Second Temple. Exile forced us to adapt to make our religion a portable one. As time went on, prayer and study replaced sacrifice and pilgrimage, and the written word became the source of our survival as a people. The fact that we can read and study the Torah anywhere has made it possible for Jews to exist in the Diaspora. Why then, is it so powerful an experience to do this in Israel?

In Israel, author Mona Paul ascends from a pit, similar to the one Joseph experienced in the Bible.

Having studied in Toronto for the past five years with a small group of women in the comfort of our living rooms, I found the prospect of study sessions on mountainsides and open fields in Israel thrilling. We were prepared to be distracted by the landscape. We expected to be overwhelmed by the notion of walking in the footsteps of our ancestors. What we didn't know, was how profoundly it would enrich our understanding of the biblical material. The words themselves took on a new and fuller meaning when the places they described were spread out before our eyes.

One of the first places we visited was Neot Kedumim, a biblical landscape reserve between Tel Aviv and Jerusalem. Spread over 625 acres of low hills and valleys, it is a miracle of ecological restoration. Hundreds of plant varieties, common to this area in biblical times, have been planted amid excavations that reveal cisterns, threshing floors, olive and wine presses, ritual baths and other aspects of ancient daily life. Goats, sheep and other animals roam freely, clearly revealing how tough Jacob's task was in cross-breeding the sheep and goats he earned from Laban as wages (Genesis 30:37). Watching the aggressive and independent goats, from what we hoped was a safe distance, it was patently obvious that God's help would have been essential.

Israel is sometimes described as the land of the seven species (Deuteronomy 8:8). A marvelous reconstruction shows where and how these would have been cultivated. From one vantage point we could see layers of elevated terraces. Vines were growing above them at the top of the hill, next to a watchtower which was once used to protect the fields and crops. On the upper levels were figs and pomegranates with olive trees scattered among them.

The terraces themselves were green with wheat and barley, and at the bottom of the hill were date palms from which "honey" was made. We learned that while these species require hard work and God's blessing to cultivate successfully, many other plants are endemic to the land and continue to grow and thrive even in times of famine. Although these may not have been enough to sustain life, they were of great value in ancient times. This is evident when Israel tells his sons to go back to Egypt for food, and to take with them some of the "choice products" of the land, such as balm, honey, gum, laudanum, pistachio nuts and almonds (Genesis 43:11). Our guide, Ronit, pointed out the plants believed to be gum, which is a disinfectant often used to clean teeth, and laudanum, used to embalm the dead.

Israel a place to nurture spiritual growth

Cisterns were dug out of the ground to catch and store rainwater. The recent dry winter made it possible for us to descend into an open cistern in Neot Kedumim to see how the walls had been plastered to prevent seepage, as well as to get a sense of the amount of water required for a small group of people to survive through the dry season. A winter like the one we had this year would have meant death in biblical times.

As we climbed down the ladder into the large pit, we disturbed a nest of birds and we mistook their fluttering for bats. When the echo of our screams died down, it became possible to imagine what Joseph must have felt after being cast into a similar pit by his brothers. We can assume that the biblical pit was also an empty cistern, since we are clearly told there was no water in it (Genesis 37:24). We felt a powerful sense of the fear and abandonment Joseph must have felt.

Another time, in a re-enactment of Eliezer's encounter with Rebecca at the well (Genesis 24:16-20), I played Rebecca, and drew water using a rope and a bucket, just as she would have. After only one bucketful, my arms became sore and tired. And unlike Rebecca, I did not run back and forth from the well to the trough. We calculated that it would have taken at least 300 buckets of water to serve Eliezer and his camels. Clearly, it wasn't only Rebecca's kindness that Eliezer was testing, but her physical strength and endurance as well.

Near Beersheva, we visited the wells of Abraham. In stark contrast to the fertile hills and valleys just an hour or two away by bus, this terrain was hard and rocky. We held a study session on a windy hill where we watched a herd of camels slowly make their way along the wadi next to us. We discussed the significance of wells, noting how crucial water was, and still is, to survival in Israel, and we found new insight into Isaac's success in the land (Genesis 26:12).

'Isaac sowed in the land'

The text states that "Isaac sowed in the land..." Even without considering God's blessing in allowing him to reap a hundredfold, we were struck by how difficult it must have been to plant at all. To clear the rocks, till the soil and find the water required an enormous amount of faith.

This faith is evident once again in Isaac's perseverance in digging up Abraham's old wells (Genesis 26:18). Each time he was challenged, he dug again, refusing to waste energy fighting with his enemies. He chose instead to continue digging, confident that he would find life-giving water deep within.

Water presented us with another powerful image at Nachal David, near En-Gedi. We climbed up to the spring on paths carved in sun-drenched rock, with rushes the only indication of the water that lay ahead. Rounding a bend, we gasped at the beauty of the white water cascading down the mountain. In the loud rushing of the water we heard the music David must have heard when he hid in this area from King Saul. We hear the melody of this water in David's psalms: "The voice of the Lord is over the waters" (Psalm 29).

Stirred to singing and dancing a horah ourselves, much to the amusement of a group of young people who followed us up, we understood how music could be a form of worship. We experienced something similar in Safed, sitting in a tiny shtiebl where we were moved almost to tears as we swayed to the music of Shlomo Carlebach.

Sitting where Deborah sat on Mount Tabor, and feeling the ghosts of Saul and Jonathan on Mount Gilboa, we gathered more insights into the biblical events and characters that formed us as a people. How lucky we are to have Israel – not just as our second home, but as a place to nurture our spiritual growth.

Scene in Ottawa

By G.K. SIMCOE

World attention was riveted last week on the Balkans. But here in Ottawa, another, albeit less sensational, drama was unfolding on the steps of Parliament Hill.

Two encounters converged to create an interesting dynamic all of its own. On March 23, the Canada-Israel Committee led a delegation to meet with Foreign Minister Lloyd Axworthy.

The next day marked the first official visit to Ottawa of Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat. Both parties received less and more than they expected.

The meeting with Axworthy was a bit unusual in its own right. Normally, a small group representing the Jewish community will meet with a foreign minister to "make the case" for Israel.

For this meeting, however, the group was composed of an oversized collection of 20 individuals representing virtually every organization or community federation. The political message they were trying to convey was inescapable. Namely, that the Jewish community had the capacity to draw together every constituency, from Peace Now on the left to the supporters of Jewish settlements on the right. That's no mean achievement and Axworthy would have to have taken notice.

By contrast, Arafat arrived with little fanfare. He was met at the airport not by government officials, but by an assembly of Arab ambassadors. Fatigued by his extensive travels, Arafat cancelled much of his program. More to the point, no one held out much chance for him to advance his independence-for-Palestine agenda with the government.

So imagine his (indeed, everyone's) surprise when at a media scrum before his departure Arafat heard Prime Minister Jean Chrétien virtually endorse the demand for an independent state (though Chrétien did indicate that it would best be achieved through direct negotiations with Israel).

Forces hostile to Israel have long complained that Canadian policy is skewed by the inordinate influence of the pro-Israel lobby. Even those who have no particular argument with the Jewish community believe that its Israel lobby is among the most sophisticated operations in town.

Maybe its success rests with the ability to bring such different players around the same table as it did for the meeting with Axworthy. If so, perhaps it should bring out the table again, because even if the foreign minister heard the message, his boss, the prime minister, seems to be reading from a different script.

Israeli field hospital to aid Kosovo refugees

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Stepping up its aid to Kosovo refugees, Israel will send an entire IDF field hospital to the area tomorrow, along with eight to 10 physicians and dozens of army personnel.

The mission will be headed by Health Minister Yehoshua Matza, with the hospital expected to operate for at least two weeks.

Meanwhile, former prime minister Shimon Peres has been asked by one of the sides involved in the Kosovo conflict to mediate between the adversaries. Peres confirmed to Ha'aretz that he had been approached, but said that he would not become involved as long as only one side had expressed an interest in his mediation.

Israel is maintaining contact with the UN High Commissioner for Refugees to assess if aid is most needed in Albania or Macedonia.

Setting up the field hospital in Macedonia would probably be simpler due to the easy access to the border from the Macedonian capital, Skopje, but plans have yet to be finalized. Israel is also coordinating its activity with the governments in the area and its flight paths over the Balkans with NATO.

The decision on the aid mission was made Sunday in a meeting convened by Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu with Defence Minister Moshe Arens, Foreign Minister Ariel Sharon, Matza and Jewish Agency acting chair Salai Meridor.

The possibility of opening Israel's doors to Albanian refugees from the Kosovo area did not come up in the meeting, although diplomatic sources said Jews from Yugoslavia might show an interest in immigrating to Israel.

Apart from the field hospital, the Jewish Agency is set this week to transport three planeloads of humanitarian aid by civilian means to Kosovo refugees. The agency will mount a campaign in Israel to collect clothes and raise funds for displaced people.

The first Jewish Agency plane left for Albania Tuesday, carrying $100,000 to $150,000 (US) of medical supplies, tents, sleeping bags, blankets and food for infants. Two additional flights were scheduled for this week.

Meridor will meet with the Albania's ambassador to Israel today to work out the operation's logistics.

Meanwhile, an Israeli Air Force Hercules cargo plane with Science Minister Silvan Shalom aboard, took off for Albania at dawn on Friday, loaded with 12 tons of medical supplies, warm clothing and tents aimed for refugees fleeing Kosovo. Foreign Minister Ariel Sharon said he hoped the suffering of the Kosovars would end soon.

"Israel views with severity any act of killing, attack, or expulsion of innocent civilians," the minister said in a statement on Sunday. "As loyal friends of the United States, we expect that United States and NATO forces will do everything possible to stop the suffering of innocent people and renew the negotiations between the two sides as soon as possible."

He added: "Israel is always ready to provide humanitarian aid to innocent refugees. It is the moral responsibility of Israel and of the Jewish people to do so."

The plane landed Friday in Skopje, Macedonia, where some of the supplies were unloaded for use by refugees. The rest of the cargo was to continue on to Tirana, Albania.

Air Force Commander Major General Eitan Ben Eliyahu, whose family originates from Macedonia, accompanied the flight. He took advantage of the stopover in Skopje to visit the Jewish quarter of the city. "My mother was born here, and in 1913, when she was five, she immigrated to the land of Israel," he said.

In related developments, the Defence Ministry denied a report in the London-based newsletter Foreign Report that Israel was considering selling arms to the Serbs. "Israel doesn't sell arms, not to the Serbians and not to the Albanians," spokesman Avi Kalstein said.

On the eve of Pesach, the Fatachi family arrived in Israel from war-torn Kosovo. The Jewish Agency brought them to Israel after they crossed the border into Hungary. From left, Nejatin, 47, Natasha, 44, Igor, 16 and Anita, 23. The family is being temporarily lodged at the Canada Immigration Absorption Centre in Jerusalem. Immediately after arriving in Jerusalem, they took part in the Pesach seder with Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and his family. [Israel Sun photo]

Syria faces economic troubles

By NITZAN HOROWITZ
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Several top U.S. officials who have recently visited Damascus are saying that the Syrian economy is in serious trouble, with one congressman describing it as in "a state of collapse."

The economic troubles are seen as part of a larger crisis in Syria.

In addition to reports prepared by Undersecretary of State for Near East Affairs Martin Indyk that clearly indicate a deterioration in the Syrian economy, various sources report that morale is declining in the Syrian army. The fact that recent demonstrations outside the U.S. and Greek embassies got out of hand, the sources say, is an indication of the trouble rippling through the security apparatus in the country.

More than anything, the crisis atmosphere is evident in the economy. In 1997, there was a 4.4 percent decline in production after two straight years of growth. Per capita production, a key economic figure, is down to less than $900 (US) a year, after reaching $1,050 a year in 1995.

"It's an economy in retreat," said one source in Washington.

"Deterioration is evident everywhere," said a congressman who recently visited the country. "When I went from Syria to Jordan, I felt like I was going from Nigeria to Switzerland."

There are differences of opinion about how the economic crisis in Syria will affect the peace process with Israel. An Israeli source claims that the U.S. administration is pessimistic about the peace process moving forward after the elections because of the Syrian domestic crisis, the priority President Hafez al-Assad gives to Syrian hegemony in Lebanon, and concern in Damascus with the question of who will succeed the aging leader.

Washington sources say that the status of Assad's son Basal is not at all clear, and the likelihood that he will inherit his father's position is uncertain.

Those sources say the Syrian president is busy with "cautious political calculations" and is worried that a diplomatic breakthrough could lead to uncontrollable changes in his regime.

On the other hand, senior congressional sources said that if there is a political change in Israel there is a good chance for a peace deal with Syria.

"Assad is ready for a move," said one source, adding that although Assad has health problems, "he is in full control and certainly not near death."

Economic figures show that a dearth of foreign investment and no growth in exports have prevented the Syrians from meeting goals they set last year.

The economic slowdown is evident in agriculture, commerce and construction. Revenues from tourism, wages sent by Syrian workers overseas and oil sales are also down sharply, while international commodity prices for both oil and agriculture don't offer much promise of salvation.

U.S. sources predict further declines in the Syrian economy this year, as revenues dip in all of the country's main economic areas. The sources say they expect the gross domestic product to drop another two to four percent. With oil now forming some 70 percent of Syrian revenue and international oil prices remaining low, Washington believes that Syrian expenditures on oil exports are taking critical funding away from investment in infrastructure, education and health.

A question the Jewish people continually ask is "where was the rest of the world during the Holocaust?" One day, the refugees from Kosovo might wonder the same thing about the Jewish people.

Holocaust restitution a low-key issue in France

By LEE YANOWITCH
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

PARIS — French Jewish leaders, unlike their North American counterparts, are taking a low-key approach to the restitution issue.

While there have been international headlines about the multi-million dollar lawsuits against banks and insurance companies accused of profiting during World War II from looted Jewish assets, the Jewish leadership in France has focused its energy on setting the historical record straight.

CRIF, France's umbrella group for secular Jewish organizations, believes that re-educating the French about their country's role in the persecution of Jews is more important than material redress.

And they fear that stressing monetary compensation would obscure the message they are trying to get across.

"We are in the process of rewriting history. There is no price tag on teaching the French about their role in the Holocaust. It would pollute the subject if we started announcing figures," Henri Hajdenberg, president of CRIF, told JTA.

Jewish leaders here have made repeated efforts to force the French to come to grips with their wartime past. It is only in the past few decades that the French have seen cracks appear in the French myth that their nation was united in their struggle against the Nazis, who occupied France from 1940 to 1944.

And it took until 1995 for a French president to publicly acknowledge the collaborationist Vichy administration's active involvement in stripping Jews of their rights and deporting them to death camps.

"Everything we've done in the past 25 years is in danger of being destroyed by material demands, Hajdenberg said, suggesting that pushing France to confront its Vichy past is the "most important thing today in order to fight anti-Semitism and totalitarianism."

Hajdenberg and his colleagues feel this is particularly pressing, given that France's extreme-right National Front, with 15 percent of the nationwide vote, is the most powerful fascist party in Europe.

Of all the European countries that came under the Nazi boot during World War II, France suffered the most widespread looting and confiscation of Jewish property.

Most of the 76,000 Jews deported from France during the war were immigrants from Eastern Europe. Only 2,500 returned.

France's Sephardi Jews, most of whom emigrated from North Africa in the 1950s and 1960s, are less concerned about the problem of setting the record straight.

While most Ashkenazi Jews – who make up 30 to 40 percent of the nation's 700,000-strong Jewish population -- back the CRIF's diplomatic stance on restitution, voices of discord are making themselves heard, accusing CRIF of not wanting to ruffle any feathers.

"It is a well-known fact that France's Jewish leadership has always wanted to be in with the powers that be. But many of the heirs of Holocaust victims contest what the CRIF is doing," said historian David Douvette.

At the same time, the New York-based World Jewish Congress is annoyed at being excluded from French negotiations on Holocaust-era claims. Some WJC officials have accused their CRIF counterparts of not asking for money because they are afraid of fomenting anti-Semitism.

But Hajdenberg contends that he, too, believes victims should be compensated; he just disagrees with the high-level pressure used to force countries to come to an agreement.

A compensation deal Hajdenberg had reportedly planned to sign recently with the French Banking Association, fell apart at the last minute amid discord among French Jewish leaders.

The banks went ahead with the proposal anyway, announcing last week that they would take "comprehensive measures" to compensate survivors for lost assets.

News of the deal triggered a threat of resignation by members of the Matteoli Commission, a French government-appointed panel investigating the looting of Jewish assets during the war.

Hajdenberg is also under fire from his colleagues for going on a "peacemaking" tour of the Middle East earlier this month, where he met Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat, Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak and Jordan's King Abdullah. He was not received by Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu.

In protest, CRIF's single largest member, the Consistoire, which tends to the religious needs of French Jews, has pulled out of the umbrella group.

Consistoire President Jean Kahn is furious that he was not consulted about either the bank deal or the Middle East trip.

There is even talk of forcing Hajdenberg to resign.

Meanwhile, Jean Matteoli, a concentration camp survivor and former Resistance fighter who heads the commission that bears his name, outraged French Jews by saying in a newspaper interview that Jewish victims of the Nazis should be treated no differently than other victims.

The interviewer then suggested that a distinction should indeed be made, given that Jews were deported to death camps for the sole reason that they were Jewish.

Contradicting the widely proven fact that the Vichy regime drew up the lists of Jews who were arrested by French police and deported on French trains, Matteoli answered: "It was the Germans who made that distinction."

Hajdenberg declined to comment about Matteoli's remark, but a high-ranking source inside CRIF called for Matteoli's resignation.

"These remarks are unacceptable and totally incompatible with his role as president of the commission," the source said.

British bank implicated in Nazi dealings

By DOUGLAS DAVIS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LONDON — The manager of the French branch of Barclays, Britain's leading commercial bank, not only acted as the Nazis' banker during World War II, but also volunteered to hand over Jewish staff members, according to documents found in the U.S. National Archives.

The materials were located by researchers working on a BBC television documentary, Banking With Hitler, which examined the role of European banks during the war.

Barclays named

According to the material, senior officials at the bank's Paris branch "volunteered" information about its Jewish employees to the Nazis, and helped to arrange financing for projects that aided the Nazi war effort.

The records also show that the bank received a substantial cash deposit from the Drancy transit camp located in a Parisian suburb, where valuables were plundered from Jewish prisoners bound for Auschwitz.

The full extent of the bank's involvement with the occupying Nazis has never been fully investigated, but Barclays has acknowledged that of the 16,000 accounts held by its Paris branch in 1941, some 335 depositors may have been Jewish.

Facing the prospect of a lawsuit last year from survivors living in the United States, the bank announced in December that it was establishing a $3 million fund to repay unclaimed assets held by its Paris branch.

According to the material in the National Archives, U.S. Treasury officials who conducted an investigation in France immediately after the war, discovered a close collaboration between the British bank's French officials and the Nazis.

Their report says that bank manager Marcel Cheradame had been "very amenable to the wishes of the German administrator, Hans Joachim Caesar."

Barclays continued to employ Cheradame as its Paris manager until he retired in the 1960s.

One of the most startling findings, was that a French official of Barclays told Caesar that the bank had a few Jewish employees, and surprisingly, Caesar rejected the information.

The treasury officials noted that "this is one instance of the bank's unsolicited efforts to fall in line with German views."

Barclays denies that it had any knowledge of the activities of its Paris branch during World War II.

Israel Election Notebook

May 17

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

A total of 33 parties have officially asked to run in the May 17 election.

The record number includes 20 new parties and 13 veteran parties. Among the older parties are several which have failed in the past to win enough votes for a seat in the Knesset, according to applications received by the Central Election Committee (CEC) after registration ended last week on Wednesday.

Among those who have been undaunted by past failure and are making a fresh bid for the next Knesset are the Power to Pensioners party, which won 15,000 votes in the last election, the Organization for Democratic Action, which last time garnered 1,351 votes, and the anti-alimony Party for Men's Family Rights, which found 2,338 supporters in the 1996 election.

There are six candidates for prime minister: incumbent Benjamin Netanyahu, One Israel leader MK Ehud Barak, Centre party leader MK Yitzhak Mordechai, United Nationalist Movement leader MK Benny Begin, Balad leader MK Azmi Bishara, and former Knesset member Rabbi Yosef Ba-Gad of Moreshet Avot.

The CEC has until April 22 to rule on whether any of the parties or candidates are ineligible to run.

Already, CEC officials have cast doubts on some signatures presented by Ba-Gad.

Under Israeli law, a candidate must submit a list of 50,000 signatures of supporters or have the support of 10 current Knesset members to qualify to run for prime minister.

If Ba-Gad does not have the required number of valid signatures, his candidacy will have to be denied, a committee source said.

The traditional television broadcasts of political advertisements will be longer than usual in this election due to the large number of parties running. Voters will be able to watch a total of 690 minutes, or about 40 minutes a night, for 17 days.

Under state regulations, each of the 33 parties running is entitled to 10 minutes of television campaign advertising. Parties are also allowed three minutes for every Knesset member they now have. Television advertising will begin on April 26 and end on May 15.

Indonesia may establish relations with Israel

By DOUGLAS DAVIS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LONDON — Indonesia, the most populous Islamic state in the world, appears set to establish formal diplomatic relations with Israel after Indonesian elections are held in June.

The Israeli ambassador to Singapore is reported to have made several unpublicized visits to Indonesia in recent months to meet political and military officials, including aides to President Bacharuddin Jusuf Habibie, the favorite in the elections.

The visits were apparently aimed at establishing an Israeli diplomatic presence in Indonesia in the post-Suharto era.

Suharto was forced to resign in May of last year as a result of popular protests.

Recognition of Israel by Indonesia, which has a population of 210 million, could clear the way for the establishment of ties with Israel by such Asian Muslim states as Malaysia and oil-rich Brunei.

The London-based daily Asharq al-Awsat reported Monday that Israel had created relationships with the Indonesian military and business elites earlier in the decade, culminating in visits by former Israeli prime ministers Yitzhak Rabin in 1993 and Shimon Peres in 1995.

One of the key figures in the Suharto regime, Gen. Benny Mordani, who was defence minister from 1988 to 1993, publicly advocated the establishment of relations with Israel, a proposal that was enthusiastically embraced by some politicians from the minority Catholic, Chinese and Buddhist communities.

Mordani is believed to have made several secret visits to Israel and to have concluded various intelligence and military cooperation accords, some of which are understood to be still operational.

Israeli expertise is understood to have been used by the Indonesian army against separatist rebels in the early 1990s.

Veteran Foreign Minister Ali Alatas is known to oppose diplomatic ties with Israel before its dispute with the Palestinians is resolved, but he is unlikely to remain in office after the election.

The Saudi-owned Asharq al-Awsat noted that a leader of Nahdatul-Ulema movement – an Indonesian Islamic society with an estimated 35 million members – has been advocating diplomatic ties with Israel, but has been opposed by others, including many within his own movement.

A recent article in the Catholic-owned, English-language Jakarta Post, which supports ties with Israel, said the United States has been putting pressure on Jakarta to agree to the ties.

Saddam still going strong

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Mideast Analysis

Despite the fierce bite of United Nations economic sanctions, an American and British aerial bombing campaign to enforce the no-fly zones in northern and southern Iraq and periodic internal revolts, Saddam Hussein's Ba'athist regime shows no signs of cracking.

Saddam, who seized power 20 years ago this summer, remains firmly entrenched, in spite of numerous attempts to unseat him. Cognizant of these grim realities, the United States has intensified its efforts to undermine him.

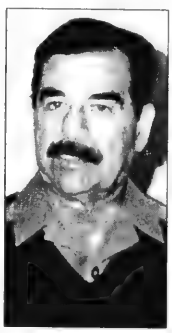
There have been two major developments in the past six months. Last autumn, Congress passed the $97 million Iraq Liberation Act, which authorizes President Bill Clinton to support the Iraqi opposition politically and logistically. At the end of January, U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright, in a swing through friendly Arab capitals, outlined a fresh approach to Saddam: "containment plus regime change."

In practice, this means that Washington has committed itself to a long-range program of exerting military, political, economic and diplomatic pressure on Iraq, which has proven to be one of the chief destabilizing elements in the Middle East.

The policy has been tacitly endorsed by Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, Egypt, Jordan and Turkey, notwithstanding their strong reservations about the disastrous effects of sanctions on ordinary Iraqis.

No one, however, believes that Saddam's days are numbered. The chances of a successful popular revolt in Iraq are extremely slim, given the repressive nature of his regime.

Iraq is a one-party totalitarian state. Saddam's multi-layered security forces have infiltrated every stratum of society. Harsh reprisals, ranging from long prison sentences to executions, await dissidents. The media is state-owned and rigidly controlled. Satellite dishes and access to the Internet are prohibited. Contacts with the few foreign travellers who visit Iraq are discouraged. In short, Iraq is a republic of fear.



Saddam Hussein

Despite the formidable firewall he has built around himself and his cronies, Saddam – a Sunni Muslim in a predominantly Shiite nation – has repeatedly been forced to deal with attempted coups by disaffected army officers and with rebellions by Kurds in the north and Shiites in the south.

Since the end of the Gulf War, the United States has played a significant role in fostering dissension in Iraq, though Congress recently objected to a Central Intelligence Agency plan to destabilize Saddam's clique.

In 1991, President George Bush encouraged the Shiites to revolt, but effectively abandoned them when Saddam struck back. To this day, resistance simmers in the marshlands near the city of Basra.

Bush also created a Kurdish enclave adjacent to the Turkish border, but turned down demands by the Kurds for total independence. The United States opposes Kurdish sovereignty in Iraq for two reasons. It would arouse great repugnance among neighboring countries, particularly Turkey, a close ally whose air bases are vital to Iraq's containment. And it would be an immense source of instability in the entire region, home to 25 million Kurds.

Washington's public embrace of six of the largest Iraqi organizations dedicated to Saddam's demise has been greeted with more than a little skepticism.

Running the gamut from the Iraqi National Congress to the Iraqi Communist Party, these groups are weak, divided and vulnerable to infiltration and attack. The Kurdistan Democratic Party and the Patriotic Union of Kurdistan are fierce rivals and have fought each other. In August 1996, the Iraqi army stormed into the Kurdish enclave north of the 36th parallel and all but decimated the Iraqi National Congress, whose objective is to unite Kurds and Shiites.

It will be extremely difficult to topple Saddam, a ruthless master of survival. He enjoys a clear advantage over his enemies, and this situation is not likely to change any time soon.

FILM FEST OFFERS MANY HIGHLIGHTS

The Toronto Jewish Film Festival, which runs April 29 to May 6 at the Cineplex Odeon Hyland Cinemas (Yonge and St. Clair), offers 63 films from 15 countries at two cinemas, some 18 of which are scheduled to be introduced by visiting directors and/or producers.

The week's programming includes dramas and documentaries, comedies and animated films, silent and short films, as well as two restored classic Yiddish films and a historic comedy compilation starring Charlie Chaplin and others. Among the offerings:

• Andre's Lives (U.S., 1998, 55 min.) At 89, André Steiner, a Bauhaus architect who saved thousands of Slovak Jews during the Holocaust, returns to Slovakia accompanied by his sons.

• Photographer (Poland, 1998, 76 min.) A realistic and disturbing portrait of life in the Lodz Ghetto, based on some 400 color slides that were discovered in a secondhand bookstore in Vienna in 1987.

• Stateless, Arrogant and Lunatic (Sweden, 1998, 100 min.) The amazing tale of Gilel Storch, a mysterious Latvian Jewish refugee in Sweden, who actually initiated talks with Heinrich Himmler, the head of the Gestapo, to save Jews in the waning days of the war.

• Visas and Virtue (U.S., 1997, 26 min.) The poignant dramatization of the life of Chiune Sugihara, the Japanese consul in Lithuania, who saved thousands of Jews during the Second World War.

• Mother's First Olympics (Israel, 1997, 54 min.) Tami Carmeli seems like an average wife and mother — except for her blindness. But that doesn't prevent her from preparing for the 1996 Atlanta Paralympic Games in lawn bowling.

• The Personals (U.S., 1998, 37 min.) This perceptive and charming documentary juxtaposes a play about the search for love, performed by Manhattan seniors, with the actors' own observations about finding romance.

• Isaac Bashevis Singer "...About A Hidden God..." (France, 1998, 50 min.) A tribute to the great Yiddish writer, who comments on his fame, his Nobel prize, and his philosophy of love, sex, women and Judaism. Presented with the animated short, Gimpel the Fool.

• Shtick, Schmaltz and Shtereotypes: Jewish Images in the Cinema (U.S., various years, 120 min.) George Burns and Woody Allen, Mel Brooks, Eddie Cantor, Jack Benny and Charlie Chaplin are just some of the stars feted in Murray Glass's eclectic presentation of hidden Jewish jewels and rarities.

• A Letter Without Words (U.S., 1998, 62 min.) When Lisa Lewenz discovered dozens of reels of 16mm film taken by her grandmother, Ella, in interwar Germany, she also discovered that her family was Jewish.

• Moskowitz's City (Israel, 1998, 30 min.) A hard-hitting exposé of Irving Moskowitz, the American millionaire whose donations fuel Arab-Israeli tensions in Jerusalem.

• Primetime War (Israel, 1998, 51 min.) Does a camera create or cover a news story? Noam Shalev's controversial documentary follows two TV cameramen, an Israeli and a Palestinian, as they film violent acts in Hebron and Jerusalem.

All films $8, seniors & students $5 with ID. 324-8600. Web site www.tjff.com.

The ensemble which just released its 37th CD Verdi and Variations is led by Jewish cellist Yuli Turovsky. April 14 at 8 p.m.Tickets $27-$40 from the box office or Ticketmaster 870-8000.

In the Spotlight: During a recent performance at Toronto's Roy Thomson Hall, the legendary American folk trio Peter, Paul and Mary dazzled an appreciative audience by playing spirited renditions of some of their best-known hits over nearly four decades of singing. Selections included Puff the Magic Dragon, If I Had A Hammer, Blowin' In The Wind, Leaving On A Jet Plane, Where Have All the Flowers Gone, and numerous others that reflected the group's continuous support of social justice and harmony.

Fans of the group should not have been surprised when Peter Yarrow, during a 15-minute solo appearance, revealed that he is Jewish and wished the audience a happy Passover. His song, Don't Let the Lights Go Out, seemed a rousing appeal to maintain one's cultural heritage while reaching out to others of different backgrounds and beliefs.

Various mentions and expressions of a quick peace were made during the evening to Israel, Kosovo, Northern Ireland, Rwanda and other political hot spots.

A good wish, Mr. Yarrow, and may it go from your mouth to God's ear!

Jacques Brel is alive in Toronto

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The timeless and well-loved musical, Jacques Brel is Alive and Well and Living in Paris, is playing in Toronto at the Winter Garden Theatre until April 24.

This time it has an all-Canadian cast of musical stars. It also includes three new songs by the Belgian-born composer, which enhance the play's bittersweet tone.

Brel's music speaks of lost loves and broken dreams while not forgetting the humor that is also a part of life. And this time the musical has brand-new orchestrations.

This new production has already played at the National Arts Centre in Ottawa, and at Vancouver's Vogue Theatre, where Michael Burgess, Susan Henley, Jeff Hyslop and Louise Pitre won rave reviews for their work.

Jacques Brel is the type of show whose haunting melodies and insightful comments stay with the viewer for a lifetime.

The show is supported by an eight-piece on-stage orchestra and a stunning contemporary set design.

The musical, conceived by Eric Blau and the late Mort Shuman, is directed by Elly Stone. An accomplished singer and performer, Stone also once starred in the musical herself.

Tickets, which range from $29 to $65, can be purchased at the Elgin and Winter Garden Theatre box office, any Ticketmaster location or by calling 872-5555.

Comic novel about sports also tackles mid-life crisis

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts editor

David Epstein has one dream: to build a Jewish athletes' hall of fame shaped like a Magen David and made of glass. But where can the bankrupt real-estate agent raise the capital?

In Lowell Komie's The Last Jewish Shortstop in America (Swordfish/Chicago $16.25), Epstein turns to his friends in the Jewish community– lawyers, doctors, businessmen – to raise funds for his mammoth project.

But in a comic twist, his potential investors, all want more than just a return on their investment. They want their own halls. Thus, to his dismay, Epstein's memorial to Jewish athletes has little niches dedicated to Jewish allergists, chartered life underwriters and orthodontists.

Epstein slowly loses control over his vision of the hall of fame, as he loses control over his own life and his sanity.

In fact, underlying the comic story of his quest to build a Jewish athletes' hall of fame, is a tale of a middle-age crisis. It's a story of a man on the threshold of a complete mental breakdown.

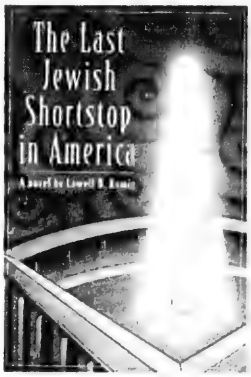
His domestic life is in shambles. His ex-wife is threatening to have him jailed for being delinquent on his child-support; his older daughter in law school wants him to continue paying her tuition; his credit cards are cancelled; his affair with a 28-year-old is fizzling; and in a Lolita-like twist, he finds himself the attraction of a pubescent friend of his younger daughter.

There are many amusing diversions in this book and perhaps of interest to Canadian readers is Epstein's trip to Toronto and Montreal.

Komie's observations of Canada and Canadians are humorously exaggerated. For example, the author describes Bloor Street in Toronto, this way: "No one seemed to be rushing. No one was shoving or bullying or screaming. The cars didn't aim at you as you crossed at the light...So this was Canada. Where was the acid rain? There wasn't even a mist on the streets."

In a bar on Sherbrooke Street in Montreal, Epstein orders a "Moulson." Well, we won't let that little error ruin an otherwise entertaining novel.

By using clever insights and comically exaggerated supporting characters, Komie is able to make a hero out of an otherwise desperate character.



The Last Jewish Shortstop in America won the 1998 Small Press Book Award and Komie won other awards previously. It is sold on Amazon and Barnes & Noble Web sites or you can write to Swordfish/Chicago Publishers, Suite 521, 155 N. Michigan Ave. Chicago, Ill. 60601.

Kosherica holidays for the observant

By SHERRI ZIFF LAUSTER
Special to The CJN

As a confirmed travelaholic with no intentions of becoming abstinent, feeding my addiction has become more challenging – but not impossible – as I've become more observant.

I can arrange my schedule to arrive well before sundown Friday – no problem. I can explore on foot Saturday and return Sunday for must-have photo opportunities – not a big sacrifice. Often, I've arranged to daven with the local Jews, and share a Shabbat meal together. Sometimes I've happily corralled unsuspecting secular Jews into having kiddush and challah.

But the problem, or should I say challenge, of food still remains. I can make do with cold vegetarian if I have to. But truth be known, I still long for hot, local delicacies.

I knew deep down that G-d wouldn't lead me down a spiritual path, only to slam the door on my greatest passion. So I davened with kevanah for kosher restaurants to spring up in places like Bora-Bora and Portofino.

I screamed when I first heard about Kosherica, a Boca Raton-based travel company that organizes kosher cruises aboard first-rate cruise lines, to exotic destinations such as Alaska, the Caribbean and the Panama Canal.

"It's everything you'd want out of a vacation – seeing new places, relaxing in the sun, working out, and great evening entertainment," raved Los Angeles businessman Doug Schiller, who went on Kosherica's Caribbean trip aboard Holland America's M.S. Ryndam in January. "And then there's the Jewish element: Fantastic learning, daf yomi, davening – everything. I can't wait to have the time to go back again."

Doug's wife, Gail Schiller, a journalist, also raved. "It's the best of both worlds; to be on a beautiful cruise ship, and to be able to get delicious, gourmet, kosher food in a beautiful restaurant with an ocean view, and enjoy your meals alongside the other ship guests."

And it gets better. I've had my eye on one particular trip for years – a cruise of the Greek islands aboard Europe's premiere cruise line, Costa Cruises. Costa is the only cruise line that provides a true European experience and is famous for catering to an international clientele.

And because I read travel brochures the way most people read the newspaper, I had noticed that on this itinerary, departing from the most romantic place on earth – Venice – the one day "at sea" was Saturday which means I didn't have to miss out on a port. (On a cruise I went on last summer, I had to pass

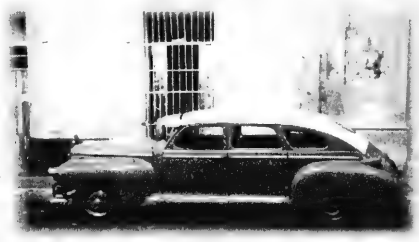
There's more to Cuba than relaxing in resorts

By GERRY SCHWARTZ
Special to The CJN

TRINIDAD, Cuba — The south shore and central region of Cuba remain fairly unfamiliar to most Canadian tourists, who flock to the large resorts in Varadero. There is much more to this large island in the Caribbean than Havana, beaches and self-contained resort areas.

The three provinces in the centre of Cuba are Sancti Spiritus, Cienfuegos and Santa Clara. The city of Trinidad, with a population of some 60,000, is the southernmost city in Sancti Spiritus. It is a colonial gem founded in 1514 and declared a UNESCO World Heritage site in 1988, the only location in Cuba besides "Old Havana" to be so designated by this UN body based in Paris. It is consequently eligible for funding to restore and refurbish its buildings in the centro storico (historical centre).

Local Cubans enjoy a game of dominos in a piazza in Trinidad.



Vintage car lovers will have a field day in Cuba where pre-Revolutionary vehicles are still the norm.
[Gerry Schwartz photos]

Trinidad has few traces of the late 20th century, and its centre is beautifully cobblestoned and closed off to any motorized traffic. The Spanish Colonial architecture of the mansions formerly owned by cattle and sugar barons, and the public buildings and churches make for nostalgic reminders of previous centuries. American cars from the 1930s to the 1950s are maintained and fully operational as particulares (private cars).

Places to visit and explore in this easily navigable-by-foot city are the Muséo Romantico (period furniture), Muséo de Arqueologia, Muséo de Musica and many beautiful colonial buildings in various states of restoration.

Some have been converted to offices and others to delightful cafés and restaurants for tourists. One of the latter, called Trinidad Colonial, has large white and black Art Deco floor tiles that look like something on a movie set.

To meet the locals, one may choose to eat at a paladar, a private home licensed to serve meals. Speaking Spanish helps, but there is always a family member with good English to translate.

I was also invited home for a cafécito by a staff member at my hotel, which was a very rewarding experience emotionally for all. Small gifts of items difficult or very expensive to purchase for Cubans are graciously appreciated and received.

From mid-afternoon when the last tour buses and groups have left Trinidad, the domino tables appear on the cobblestoned streets, and lively foursomes slap those tiles rhythmically. It was a great honor for me to be invited to play a few rounds in the square opposite the Santissima Trinidad Church, the photogenic symbol of the town.

Evenings are eerily quiet, but an Afro-Cuban folklore troupe weekly performs the heritage of their ancestors who labored in the sugarcane plantations in centuries past. There is even a disco called Las Cuevas, opened until the wee hours.

Above and north of the town lie the Escambrey Mountains, and a short trip by hired jeep will take you to a small mountain-spa village called Topès de Collantes, which offers crystal air and beautiful flora.

Further north on the road to the city of Santa Clara is the Embalse Hanabanilla, a scenic reservoir and nature area. Santa Clara itself is a university city and the home of the Ché Guevera Museum.

Individual trips can be booked with Rumbos Tours in town, or at your hotel desk. Two beach hotels on the Caribbean Sea are 16 kilometres from Trinidad, and a new luxury hotel is being built. Public transportation is difficult in Cuba, but a new service called Viazul, consisting of eight-passenger modern vans for tourists, runs between the main centres of the country.

Both Cubana and LACSA airlines of Costa Rica now have scheduled service from Toronto to Havana, but for individual, "non-package" travel, first consult the Cuban Consulate in Toronto. I even travelled locally for short distances by unusual modes for tourists: the back of a bicycle in Trinidad, a Russian-built dump truck, and (believe it or not) a Montreal bus (Rockland Route no. 119) with its original colors and markings used to transport hotel staff to and from work.

Though most of Cuba's remaining Jews are in Havana, there are scattered individuals and families of Jewish descent elsewhere. When I encountered a university student called Levi from Santa Clara, I told him about Israel, and he enthusiastically told me about his Jewish great-grandfather who came from Berlin to Cuba in the early '30s. Through generations of intermarriage and the discouragement of the open practice of any religion, this young man was proud of his connection and ancestral link.

The Cuban Tourist Board in Toronto is most helpful and can be reached at 55 Queen St. E., Suite 705, Toronto M5C 1R5; telephone 362-0700, fax. 362-6799.

Two excellent in-depth guidebooks are The Cuba Handbook by Footprint/Passport Series (1998) and The Cuba Handbook in the Moon Travel Handbooks Series (1997). The definitive Web site is www.cubaweb.cu and it is bilingual (Spanish-English).

The warmth and genuineness of the Cuban people should remain with you long after you return home.

Comic play a one-act wonder

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Every writer must have his whim, and J.J. Steinfeld, professor of English, satisfied his with a one-act play, one of four presented at the opening of the New Ideas Festival at the Alumnae Theatre.

It's a strange comic play, but for Steinfeld, a former Montrealer who teaches at the University of Prince Edward Island in Charlottetown, it's all in a day's work.

The erudite professor, who has won a Jewish Book Award for serious work, has a holiday with this droll play about a bantam wrestler named Headlock Romulus (Steve Seliotis).

Masked Marvel

Weighing only 150 pounds, Headlock can pin the behemoth Masked Marvel of Toronto to the mat. His secret? He drinks no alcohol, only copious amounts of orange juice.

Headlock's woman companion is the weirdly named Gyration, the Perpetual Motion Dream Doll, (Heather Stewart) a Montreal striptease artist.

The complications start when the stripteaser visits her brother Richie (Marc de Oliveira) in Toronto. Richie is a chocolate-chip-eating, indulgent writer, who is spoiled by the ministrations of his friend Megan (Wendy Akerboom).

He can't believe that Headlock is as good as he claims. But after the bantam puts him through a series of painful wrestling holds, he finally agrees to see him perform the next night.

As befits such an eyebrow-lifting plot, the four-member cast all give over-the-top performances, punctuated with sly winks at the capacity audience at the Alumnae's upstairs theatre.

The festival continues for two more weeks with eight different plays.

Gentrified Miami Beach is back

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

MIAMI BEACH — The gentrification of Miami Beach continues apace, and nothing better symbolizes this trend than the revitalization of Lincoln Road.

When I recently visited this glitzy Florida resort, a favorite of North American Jewish travellers, I was was almost dumbstruck by the makeover Lincoln Road had undergone since my last trip in 1996.

Open-air cafes and restaurants had sprouted, set amid regal palm trees, ornamental bushes and dazzling flower-beds.

A profusion of chic new art galleries had opened.

Shops which had been shuttered and forlorn had been supplanted by funky stores.

And perhaps best of all, there was a vibrant sense of street life on this once-neglected pedestrian mall.

A day after I rediscovered Lincoln Road, which stretches for about a kilometre from South Beach to Biscayne Bay, I read Ellie Stein's obituary in the Miami Herald.

Stein, a Miami Beach artist who had died at the age of 55, had been one of the masterminds of the rebirth of Lincoln Road.

In the mid-1980s, when Miami Beach was in a state of precipitous decay, she and other civic-minded individuals established studios on Lincoln Road.

They were the vanguard of a new wave of visionary entrepreneurs who positively transformed not only Lincoln Mall, but Miami Beach itself.

Evidence of this metamorphosis can also be found nearby, in the Art Deco Historic District, renowned for its Moderne and Mediterranean Revival architectural styles.

In the very heart of South Beach, which used to be the haunt of Jewish retirees from the frigid north, hotels which had fallen into disrepair have been renovated on a monumental scale. What had been seedy 15 or more years ago is now decidedly grand.

The pastel-colored hotels, ranging from the Essex to the Cardozo, have been primped up deliciously, and now attract a prosperous, far younger clientele, the kind of bronzed, muscle-toned beautiful people featured in glossy magazines.

Their mecca is Ocean Drive, where many of the modernized and repainted hotels sit in whimsical splendor under a warm sun.

Ocean Drive, hard by the wide beaches fronting the Atlantic, pulsates from morning to night with the buzz of conversation and Latin American music. This is no place for those who seek the comfort of solitude.

The cafes, whose denizens spill out to the sidewalks, are invariably packed with tourists. As befits the climate, people watching is a great sport here. Leggy models with impossibly slim waists and muscular males in tight pants cruise by. And on the congested road, blithe rollerbladers in shorts whoosh along, seemingly oblivious to the hubbub.

Meanwhile, near the adjoining beach, pickup volleyball games are in full swing. And at the water's edge, blissful colonies of bathers absorb the rays of the sun, for better or worse.

Washington Avenue, two blocks away from this sybaritic realm, has been largely refashioned by the relentless march of change as well.

Most notably, the famous kosher bakeries are gone, having been replaced by Cuban food emporiums, pizzerias and a fusion of international restaurants, and with them the Orthodox Jews one used to see around these parts.

Yet Jewish traditions live on further south on Washington Avenue. There, at the corner of Third Street, is the Sanford L. Ziff Jewish Museum of Florida, housed in Congregation Beth Jacob, a synagogue which flourished until some three decades ago.

Built in 1936 from a design by Henry Hohauser, the architect who conceived the Cardozo Hotel, Beth Jacob was in its heyday from the 1940s to the 1960s. As a result of demographic changes, which sent Jews northward, and Hurricane Andrew, which damaged its roof and destroyed its decorative plaster and oak floors, Beth Jacob declined into an empty hulk.

In 1995, after a $1.5-million restoration and conversion project, the shul was recast as Florida's sole Jewish museum. It is a fascinating depository of social, economic, religious and political lore, and one can easily spend hours there.

Its newest exhibit, Jews of Miami Beach: 1945 to the Present, runs until May 5. It speaks volumes about the gentrification of Miami Beach.

New drug developed to fight osteoarthritis

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A new drug which inhibits the enzymes that attack cartilage will help those who suffer from osteoarthritis, a medical specialist said here recently.

"I'm lining up for it and I'm very excited," Dr. Jerry Tenenbaum told 450 people attending a Mount Sinai Healthy Living Lecture at the Leah Posluns Theatre.

The drug, known as COX-2, will be available within a year, he told CTV health reporter Avis Favaro, the moderator.

"It is an anti-inflammatory agent that is safer for the stomach," said Tenenbaum, a consultant rheumatologist at Mount Sinai, the Toronto Hospital and Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care

Later, he told a questioner that he did not know if the new drug will be safer on kidneys than current medications, "but probably not in its first generation."

Asked about the use of glucosamine for arthritis, Tenenbaum said he is keeping an open mind on it, but that the evidence is coming in slowly. "Proper clinical trials need to be held," he said.

New drugs for the treatment of rheumatoid arthritis are coming, and he is "excited" about them, said Dr. Edward Keystone, director, the Centre for Advanced Therapeutics in Arthritis, Mount Sinai Hospital.

"These non-steroidal anti-inflammatory drugs will change what is happening to the affected joints," he said.

Describing them as "new and innovative therapy," Keystone said they will help the 300,000 Canadians with rheumatoid arthritis, most of whom are 40 to 60 years of age. Included, however, are 600 children, with cases peaking at age two and 10.

Since it has been impossible to find the "trigger" which causes arthritis, Keystone said present research is concentrating on agents which block damage to the joints.

'Could not open baby food jars'

People with rheumatoid arthritis have a life expectancy of 10 years less than others, Keystone said.

An inspirational note was sounded by Judith Gwyn-Williams, who has had rheumatoid arthritis for 13 years. She told the audience in a confident voice how she has coped with raising a family.

"I was always exhausted, could not open baby food jars, and my wrists had the strength of a baby."

Gwyn-Williams said she wears men's shoes to hide big orthotics she needs because of the disease, and wears slacks to hide her legs.

Two of her children have developed arthritis, she said.

Referring to the lecture series, chair Ted Freedman, the hospital's CEO, said, "This is an opportunity to give something back to the Jewish community which has always been the backbone of Mount Sinai Hospital."

The lectures were co-sponsored by the Jewish Women's Federation and the Bathurst Jewish Centre.

A SINGING 60TH ANNIVERSARY

Baycrest Centre Wagman members Charles and Molly Davis celebrated their 60th wedding anniversary singing with children from Ledbury Park Middle School at Baycrest recently. Baycrest Centre launches food guide for seniors

TORONTO — Poor eating habits among aging adults living in the community has prompted the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care to produce a Community Food Resource Guide for Seniors.

"Many seniors have no idea that their local grocery store may provide assisted grocery shopping," says Carol Robertson, manager of food and nutrition services at Baycrest Centre.

"We found that seniors with physical and cognitive challenges often have a difficult time finding out what resources are available to them in the community. If there is a service that delivers washed and pre-cut fruit and vegetables at a very reasonable cost, they should be aware of it."

The resource guide is written for seniors and their caregivers, and for health-care professionals who want information to pass along to their clients. The information is specific to the Toronto area, and includes grocery home delivery, assisted shopping and transportation, Internet grocery shopping, food banks and where to get prepared and special needs foods.

There are tips to help caregivers assess if an older person is at risk of malnutrition and advice on how to approach a local grocery store to provide special services for the elderly.

Poor nutrition among the elderly is the result of many factors, says Robertson. A widowed senior may often lose interest in food. Physical problems, such as difficulty chewing and swallowing, side effects from medications, and depression, are contributing factors. Frail health may prevent an elderly person from getting out regularly to grocery shop, let alone prepare a meal. Seniors generally have an impaired sense of taste and smell which can make the food they used to enjoy seem unappealing.

Most older people want to live in their own homes as long as they can. If seniors can access services to help them eat well and maintain their health and overall well-being, this will help them live independently as they age, says Robertson.

Baycrest dietitians designed the guide in an easy-to-read format. Color-coded sheets denote different topics, such as Grocery Shopping Made Easier, Prepared Foods, Eating Well on a Budget, Social Dining, How to Find Banks in Your Area, and Other Organizations That Can Provide Information, Resources and/or Services.

The Community Food and Nutrition Guide for Seniors is available free of charge and can be ordered by calling Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, 785-2500, ext. 2140.

Success in music. Success in life. It's no coincidence.

The Yamaha Music School was the best place to help our daughter Laura develop her creativity. Although she is only 12 years old, she has performed her own compositions at Yamaha Junior Original Concerts in Boston, San Diego and Tokyo.

Angie Silberberg
Yamaha Parent

My seven-year-old son began his music studies at the age of 4. Through training in the Yamaha Junior Music Course, his musical ear has already developed to a level I find astounding.

Palestinians get their own 'Balfour Declaration'

By GIL SEDAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

Analysis

The Palestinian people now have a "Balfour Declaration" of their own.

But while the original declaration that recognized the right of the Jewish people to have a national homeland was the work of Great Britain alone, the statement backing Palestinian statehood emerged earlier this month from the 15 members of the European Union (EU).

With their unequivocal backing, the EU leaders are offering to give Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat international recognition for a Palestinian state, in exchange for his willingness to postpone a unilateral declaration of statehood.

In this respect, observers noted, a strategy crafted by Arafat appears to have resulted in a major payoff.

For months, Arafat has been threatening to unilaterally declare statehood on May 4, the end of the interim period in Israeli-Palestinian peacemaking under the terms of the Oslo accords. The final-status talks, which have barely gotten off the ground, were supposed to have been completed by that date.

In recent weeks, Arafat has met with European and American officials to win their assurances of support for statehood if he postpones the declaration.

During a meeting with Arafat in Washington, President Bill Clinton fell short of giving such an assurance, reiterating U.S. policy that a state can only emerge through negotiations with Israel. But at the same time, Clinton said he would press Israel to engage in "intensive, serious and credible" peace talks that would have a deadline for completion.

Arafat also met in Ottawa with Prime Minister Jean Chrétien, who gave his support for Palestinian statehood. But, like Clinton, Chrétien said it should be reached after negotiations with Israel, not as a result of a unilateral declaration.

Echoing the U.S. desire that those negotiations not be open-ended, Chrétien said the talks cannot go on forever.

The various statements, capped by the EU declaration, all came as a result of Arafat's threat to make a unilateral pronouncement.

Never mind that Arafat might never have followed through on the threat. A unilateral declaration in early May, coming weeks before the Israeli elections, could have played directly into the hands of the one politician Arafat does not want to see re-elected – Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu.

Palestinian officials believe that in the wake of the EU statement of support and the meeting with Clinton, it is now highly unlikely that Arafat will make the unilateral declaration.

The postponement, even for a year, involves a simple calculation on Arafat's part: Better to wait and have international support for Palestinian statehood, which will prove a valuable card indeed in the final-status talks with Israel.

In addition, perhaps there will be a new Israeli leader to negotiate with after the May elections.

Just the same, a postponement of Palestinian aspirations will undoubtedly test Arafat's standing among his people at a time when his political stock has been falling.

The man whose regime has been strongly criticized for corruption and abuse of power will now be telling Palestinians to bear with him because statehood will soon be theirs.

The response he gets from his people will likely mirror their reaction to the EU declaration. The rejectionists, including leftists and Islamic fundamentalists, saw nothing special in it. Arafat supporters rejoiced.

In Israel, the reaction to the declaration was harsh indeed. The Israeli leadership – preoccupied with the coming elections – was caught off guard by the declaration, which came just weeks after EU officials reiterated their stand that they view Jerusalem as a separate entity from Israel under the terms of the 1947 partition plan that called for the internationalization of the city.

Once the declaration was made by the EU, Israeli leaders from all sides of the political spectrum came out against it.

Invoking the memory of the Holocaust, Netanyahu said, "It is a shame that Europe, where a third of the Jewish people was killed, should take a stand which puts Israel at risk and goes against our interests."

'We cannot accept this...'

He also said that EU officials had reduced their possibility of being an honest broker in Israeli-Palestinian negotiations.

The European Union "has already taken sides. Not only has it taken sides, it has even given a date," Netanyahu said.

"We cannot accept this attempt at an external dictate, a Palestinian state with a deadline by the year 2000."

His stance was echoed by members of the opposition Labor party.

Even Labor Knesset member Yossi Beilin, a key architect of the Oslo accords, said he regretted the EU declaration.

"I don't have a problem with the substance," Beilin said. "I am also in favor of Palestinian self-determination." But, he added, "The question is whether I come to that point by way of an agreement with the Palestinians on a demilitarized state, on red lines, on limitations, or whether someone from outside dictates the rules."

Meanwhile, within the Palestinian self-rule areas, the coming weeks will witness a shift in political power from the institutions of the Palestinian Authority – a product of the Oslo accords – to the organs of the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO).

With the powers of the Palestinian legislative council set to expire on May 4, Arafat will soon be calling a meeting of the PLO's Central Committee to announce what happens next.

The anticipated scenario is that Arafat will use his authority to extend the powers of the existing institutions and call for new elections for a Palestinian legislature.

He will also start setting the scene for a declaration of independence, but that move is now not expected until May – of next year.

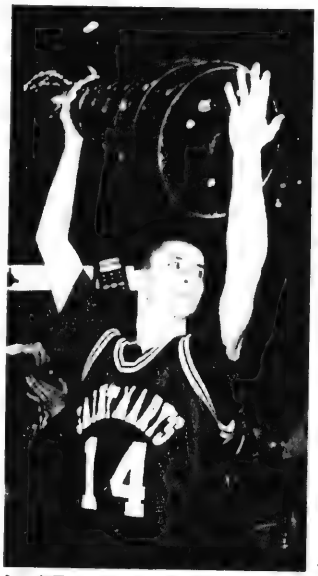
Jonah Taussig named CIAU hoops tournament all-star

Point guard key man in St. Mary's championship

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter



Jonah Taussig hoists the CIAU championship trophy.

TORONTO — For some strange reason, Jonah Taussig doesn't think he played all that well in his team's final game of the season.

Never mind that he was named a tournament all-star, that his coach calls him the heart and soul of the team and that he got tons of court time. Oh yeah, and his seventh-ranked St. Mary's Huskies happened to knock off the top ranked Alberta Golden Bears 73-69 in overtime to capture the CIAU national basketball title.

Modest to a fault, Taussig, 22, believes he could have sunk a few more baskets and played a little better in the final game, just like he did in the tournament semi-final when he had a basketful of steals, 20 points and was named game MVP.

Maybe he's used to playing superbly game in and game out – he was named Atlantic Union Athletic Association (AUAA) all-star point guard – or maybe he's just a perfectionist.

Either way, the rest of the players in the AUAA better watch out next year, because if they don't, Taussig will smoke them. At least, that's what his coach, Ross Quackenbush, believes.

Next season will be Jonah's "coming out party." Look for him to be named CIAU all-star, he predicted.

Taussig was no slouch this season, particularly in the eight-team playoffs, Quackenbush continued.

"The guy just won me a national championship," he said. "He had 13 rebounds in the championship game.

"Jonah's the key, absolutely," Quackenbush raved. "To take nothing away from the other guys, he's the linchpin. Even in a pickup game, he's a winner. Jonah's leadership is not reflected in the stats."

The tournament final, which culminated the Huskies' Cinder-fella season, was a great game to play in, Taussig said.

Unlike the semi-final, in which St. Mary's fell behind sixth-ranked McMaster by 12 points, the game against the Golden Bears was a seesaw affair. No team could open much of a lead and both squads fought hard right down to the wire, Taussig said.

Led by tournament MVP Cory Janes, who poured in 26 points and grabbed 14 rebounds against Alberta, the Huskies, ranked seventh in the eight-team tournament, squeaked out the win.

With seconds remaining in overtime, Janes drained two huge shots from the foul line to seal the victory. Kurt Henry pitched in with 15 points while Taussig had 10.

When the final buzzer went off, the atmosphere in front of the hometown fans in Halifax was wild, Taussig said. The celebrations went on for some time, he added.

Taussig was deserving of AUAA and tournament all-star honors, Quackenbush said.

"Jonah scores for us [he averaged 16 points per game] but it's when he scores that's important. He's always getting six or seven rebounds; he's always getting six or seven steals.

"He's got steals, assists, no turnovers. He just finds a way to win," Quackenbush said.

Taussig was born on Cape Breton Island, N.S. and lived there until he was six. That's when his parents, Frank, originally from Boston, and Norma, originally from Panama, packed up Jonah and his two brothers and moved the family to New Mexico. When he was about 11, Jonah's brothers Robin and Noel introduced him to basketball. Even at that age his competitive nature pushed him to do well against the older boys.

The family moved back to Canada when Jonah was in Grade 9 and Taussig played school hoops in Halifax for Queen Elizabeth High, winning two provincial championships as a shooting guard.

He was named starting point guard in his first year at St. Mary's as the team compiled a 9-11 record to advance to the AUAA championships.

Early on, Quackenbush recalls, he could see that Taussig was a special talent.

"He was a freshman starter and he got pounded, but I told him after two games, 'You're the leader.'

"It's Jonah's team."

Since then, Taussig's game has improved, as you might expect. "I've gotten smarter, a lot quicker maybe," he said.

With two more years of university eligibility remaining, Taussig, who's studying marketing, is beginning to contemplate his post-grad options. He's got friends who play pro ball in Europe, and the idea of joining them intrigues him.

Quackenbush believes Taussig could have a future in pro basketball in a European league.

"He's got good skill and he's got great instincts for the game. He's quick and he's an excellent defender on the ball. For sure he's got a future in pro basketball for any team that wants to win," he said.

The Inside Back

A shlepper's story

By JORDAN MAX

Last Laugh

I was definitely not prepared for the lineup at the chiropractor's office on Monday morning.

As I gazed around the room filled with middle-aged men like me, it didn't take long to discover the commonality; the chiropractor confirmed what I had already concluded from my conversations with the veterans in the waiting room. Every year, most married, Jewish middle-aged men attempt the equivalent of an Olympic weightlifting record by shlepping boxes of Pesachdik plates, cutlery, pots, you name it, upstairs.

Then, after only a week of recuperation time, we are required to haul them all back down to storage. There was a fancy medical term for it, vertebral pesachdosis, but it was more commonly known as shlepper's back.

In my particular case, shlepper's back just aggravated my underlying condition, first acquired when my wife was in labor with our first child (coincidentally also during Pesach).

Let me explain. There I was, being a good labor coach by assisting her during contractions. In what I can now see was a foreshadowing of the future, I was half-squatting, half-standing, when I had this extremely violent sneeze. I immediately felt this sharp lower back pain, which kept me hunched over for the duration of her labor. By the time we got to the hospital, I was willing to fight her for the painkillers. She won.

I have checked with the medical texts, and confirmed this as the world's only registered case of male injury during childbirth.

Sitting around the chiropractor's waiting room that Monday morning, us fellow shleppers recalled that many years ago, before we had kids, it seemed we had far fewer things to shlep.

Or were our backs just stronger then? We recalled, those of us with memory still intact, that most pots and utensils were just kashered for Pesach. As the years went by and our financial situations improved somewhat, we had bought more things so we and/or our wives would spend less time kashering and more time cooking.

Of course, there was a trade-off. We were just too naive to realize that less kashering meant more shlepping up and down the stairs. And the busier and more populated our households got, the faster the chametz-Pesach changeovers became, resulting in more boxes shlepped in a shorter period of time, resulting in severely strained back muscles and legs.

The cure? Lots of bed rest, and no heavy lifting for at least another six months, until it's time to put up the sukkah, which creates, you guessed it, vertebral sukkahdosis. And the cure for that is six months of no heavy lifting until it's time for...well, you get the picture.

However, one positive thing has come out of all this. I am proud to announce that we have now formed the founding chapter of the Shlepper's Club, also known as the Zokef Kefufim Society, led and facilitated by our devoted chiropractor.

The male bonding was instantaneous, straight out of the Iron John Movement Handbook, but without the hugging, wilderness retreats or primal scream therapy.

We have now realized that Jewish male backs are a precious commodity indeed, required for davening (depending on shochelling speed), the occasional hagbah at shul, numerous strenuous household tasks, such as changing light bulbs, cleaning the garage and workbench, as well as the annual Pesach and Sukkot shleppathons.

As the next course of business, we all resolved to see each other soon, in about, say, six month's time.

Postscript: With a lot of treatment, my shlepper's back is improving, and I resolve to start my weight training earlier next year. One thing is for certain, though. The next house we buy, it'll have its own dumb-waiter system installed. But until then, it'll just have to be me.

About Teens

Dear Karilani,

Our problem is the telephone. We have two daughters, ages 12 and 15, who fight and play games with each other, and with us, over phone time. The 15-year-old has more callers, and hogs the phone, creating havoc with our lives. She answers the phone before it finishes its first ring or before anyone else gets to answer. She rarely takes proper messages, especially for her sister, and at times tells our callers that we are not in. We have a second line for the Internet/fax and for emergencies. How do we deal with this talk time?

Teenage Telephone Tie-Up

Dear Teenage Telephone Tie-Up,

Living in a house with two girls can be a challenge, especially when it comes to the phone. A large portion of their social time is taken up on the phone. The telephone enables them to have a private, personal and meaningful conversation with a friend.

Phone calls are important to allow a teenager to have a sense of independence, as well as to bring a different aspect of their social life into the house. On the other hand, too much of this social chattering can cause trouble within the household. It is necessary to make rules and limitations, especially when the problem gets out of hand.

One possibility is to give conditions as to when and how long she can use the phone. If time limits are applied to the length of her calls, the phone line will be free for use by the rest of the family when her time is up. A more extreme solution is to get a third line for the girls to share, or to allow your daughter to use the fax/Internet/emergency line.

The issue of taking phone messages can be addressed in another manner. Tell your daughter that if she doesn't take proper messages, she will not be allowed to use the phone. In order to make sure that she takes messages, put pads of paper and pencils beside the phones in the house. That way, she will have more incentive to jot down the message.

If the answering machine is taken up by your daughters' callers, you may decide to invest in a call answer service. These services will take calls when someone is on the phone, and there is the option of having personal voice mail boxes for different family members, so everyone will get their own messages.

What is really important, however, is to make rules and stick to them.

Karilani is a composite name for three girls, who are close friends and in Grade 11 in Toronto

Community aids Kosovars

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Several relief funds established

TORONTO — Recent Yom Hashoah ceremonies across Canada were intensified by media images from Kosovo, eerily reminiscent of Holocaust-era refugees.

Now, Canada's Jewish community is being asked to dig deep to help the hundreds of thousands of people fleeing the horrors of Kosovo.

The community has established several relief funds, and stands ready to assist refugees if they are airlifted to Canada.

For Toronto Holocaust survivor and educator Gerda Frieberg, the stark scenes of misery and degradation broadcast nightly bring back memories of a little-known incident that occurred just prior to Kristallnacht, the November night in 1938, when Nazi thugs struck against German Jews and their property.

In the fall of 1938, the German government rounded up several hundred Jewish families with Polish roots, even those whose ties to Poland were remote, and dumped them in no-man's land between the German and Polish borders.

Frieberg was just 12 and living in the Polish town of Bielschowitz, just on the other side of the German frontier.

She remembers the local synagogue's sisterhood bringing soup and bread to the stunned refugees. "They were suddenly displaced and confused. Children were crying and no one seemed to know what to do."

Field hospital celebrates birth

Ha'aretz Daily Newspape Ltd.

BRAZDA, Macedonia — In its first two days of operation, the Israeli army field hospital in the Albanian refugee camp of Babarjda, along the Macedonian-Kosovo border, had treated 100 patients, said Dr. Yaakov Adler, an orthopedist who heads the hospital's emergency room.

A third of the patients have been elderly, suffering from chronic diseases such as diabetes, heart insufficiency, kidney insufficiency, and cancer.

Another third of the patients have been children, with illnesses such as intestinal and lung infections stemming from dehydration and contaminated conditions in the camp.

Israelis on scene

The remaining third have been women with gynecological problems.

The first day of the hospital's operation was marked with two births (and a third soon on the way) under the care of gynecologist Dr. Israel Handler.

One evening last week, 40-year-old Shoha Jirikosha came to the Israeli emergency room accompanied by her younger brother.

After a swift consultation, she stepped up on the operating table and immediately gave birth to a healthy daughter, weighing 3 kilos.

The labor was so quick that the mother only realized she had given birth a quarter of an hour after the fact and then began to cry for joy. She said the child was her fifth, and told the staff she had four young children, aged between 1 and 7 years old, waiting for her back at their tent in the camp.

She said she did not know the whereabouts of her husband Fadil, who had stayed behind in their home village. She said she would

Yom Hashoah Proclaimed

VANCOUVER — Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) welcomed the announcement by the provincial legislature that it will proclaim an annual Holocaust Memorial Day – Yom Hashoah. CJC Pacific region said the proclamation, announced recently by Lt.-Gov. Garde Gardom, is only the second such move outside Israel (Ontario passed a proclamation last year) to commemorate the Holocaust.

ISRAEL

Most Support State

JERUSALEM — Some 55 percent of Israeli Jews polled believe that the Palestinians deserve an independent state, according to the annual "peace index" survey conducted by Tel Aviv University's Tami Steinmetz Centre. But the poll found a strong majority oppose giving any portion of Jerusalem over to Palestinian rule. It also found, for the first time since the poll was conducted four years ago, that a majority of Israeli Jews do not believe Palestinians seek the destruction of Israel.

Back to Moscow

JERUSALEM — Foreign Minister Ariel Sharon is planning a second trip to Moscow within a month to press Russian officials to block the sale of ballistic missile technology to Iran. In meetings with Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, Sharon said he is disappointed with American efforts to limit the sales and prefers direct Israeli discussions with Moscow to resolve the issue.

Rabbi Disqualified

JERUSALEM — Members of Israel's Central Elections Committee have recommended that Rabbi Yosef Ba-Gad be disqualified from running for prime minister in May. The committee found that many of the signatures on the petitions supporting Ba-Gad's candidacy were forged. "At 23,000 forgeries, we stopped counting," a committee official said of Ba-Gad's petitions.

WORLD

Swiss End Task Force

BERN — The Swiss government has announced it is shutting down the special task force that oversaw efforts to examine the nation's wartime past. The controversy regarding the nation's Nazi-era financial dealings "has been settled," the government said, explaining the March 31 decision. The out-of-court settlement last August between the major Swiss banks and the World Jewish Congress, together with class-action lawsuits launched by Holocaust survivors and heirs of victims, have "finalized all financial claims on Switzerland," a government spokesperson said.

Lufthansa's Offer

BERLIN — Germany's national airline says it is prepared to pay into a fund to settle claims against German firms which profited from slave labor under the Nazi regime. Lufthansa officials acknowledged it had used prisoners of war and others living in occupied countries at the airline's wartime plants.

Governor Joins Suit

LOS ANGELES — California Governor Gray Davis joined a lawsuit by former Holocaust-era slave laborers seeking compensation from Ford, General Motors and four German companies. The lawsuit, filed March 31 by the Simon Wiesenthal Centre, charges that German subsidiaries of the two U.S. automakers reaped illicit profits through the slave laborers, who now live in California. He joined as a private citizen.

Independence Day Message from the President of the State of Israel, Ezer Weizman

Independence Day is a day of summing up and retrospection. Fifty-one years may not seem like much time in our people's long history, but after 2,000 years of exile, much has been achieved in these years since the establishment of the state.

Israel's population has grown to nearly six million, including more than one million Arab citizens enjoying equal rights. Ours is a very diverse society, but despite its many contrasts, loyalty to the state is shared by all. We have a thriving economy, a level of technology among the most advanced in the world, impressive scientific research, highly developed agriculture and a very rich cultural life.

When I contemplate our accomplishments in the past, I am filled with hope and confidence about what Israel will achieve in the coming years, including reaching peace with all our neighbors.

I would like you, our brothers and sisters in the diaspora, to participate in the significant developments about to take place here. Israel's gates are open to you, as are our hearts and our arms to welcome you and make you feel at home. In the past year approximately 50,000 new immigrants arrived here. Most of the newcomers came from eastern Europe, and they are contributing greatly to life in Israel. It is unfortunate that from the other corners of the world aliyah is so minimal. Only three percent came from North America, which has the highest concentration of Jews in the world. Hopefully we will soon witness the fulfilment of the prophet Ezekiel's words: "And I will bring them out from the people and gather them from the countries and will bring them to their own land and feed them upon the mountains of Israel."

Residents oppose Technodome site

By DANIEL WOLGELERENTER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Threats to move Destination: Technodome from Toronto to Montreal are "not serious," says a local residents' group, which intends to fight the city's approval of the billion-dollar theme park at the Ontario Municipal Board (OMB).

Backgrounder

David Birnbaum, president of the Friends of the Downsview Lands, said threats by the Reichmann family to move the facility to Montreal are "a feint" intended "to get concessions" from the federal government, which owns the land slated for the project at Sheppard Avenue and Allen Road on the former Downsview Canadian Forces base.

Friends of the Downsview Lands, which Birnbaum said represents "about 200 residents" living east of the site, is concerned about potential traffic and parking problems near Technodome.

The neighborhoods east of the site which could be affected by traffic and parking problems are approximately 40 to 50 percent Jewish, according to UJA/Federation demographer Jay Brodbar. About one third of the Jews in these neighbourhoods are over 65.

Mayor Mel Lastman, who has been an enthusiastic Technodome booster, has complained loudly in the media about the loss of jobs and taxes if Toronto loses the project, which was approved by city council last year.

Lastman said last month that Albert and Abraham Reichmann – who head Heathmount Arts and Entertainment Corporation – told him

Tragedy Has Struck

An extraordinary woman in our community—a 50 year old, single mother of 10 children, has tragically passed away after a serious illness.

Her modest salary as a secretary for one of our local Jewish Day Schools, allowed her to barely cover the basic family expenses, let alone the cost of expensive medical treatment and nursing care.

The children have been left with about $200k in debts and no further means of financial support. Funds are required for basic necessities such as food, clothing, housing and Jewish education.

The family desperately wants to stay together, with the older children taking on the responsibility of raising and ultimately marrying off the younger ones and themselves.

We appeal to you to support our community's efforts to establish a trust fund for these children. All cheques over $10 will receive charitable tax receipts. In the spirit of Jewish compassion and generosity at this holiday time, please open your hearts and donate generously. Thank you.

From the editor's desk

Seeing, with fresh eyes

In just under a week, on the fifth day of Iyar, we and people all around the world, not only Jews and Israelis, will be celebrating Yom Ha'atzmaut. This year we are marking Israel's 51st year of independence.

Those of us who care for Israel and for its people, spend a great deal of our time following developments there.

We listen; we watch; we read; we observe regularly, daily.

We tune into the incessant, ever-present, sharply defined and sharply engaged subject of politics.

We tune in to the incessant, ever-present, sharply defined and sharply engaged subject of peace and security.

We tune into the incessant, ever-present, sharply defined and sharply engaged subject of internal social stresses.

We are like custodians of a precious work of art in an art gallery. The work hangs constantly in the "background" of our daily range of vision. But in the routine of our observations, we often do not see much of its soaring and splendid detail.

So too with Israel.

We do not often enough "see" Israel with the excitement and the mystery of fresh eyes.

On my desk recently, I came across an article that did. On the "eve" of Yom Ha'atzmaut, it is appropriate, and even important, that I share excerpts with you.

The article appeared almost a decade ago in only the fifth issue of the then nascent, "fresh," Jerusalem Report of Nov. 15, 1990. The article was written by Natan Sharansky as part of the reportage of the cover story, 1917-1990: The outcome of two revolutions.

It was part of an eight-story treatment exploring how Zionism ultimately prevailed while Communism ultimately failed.

Sharansky is an excellent writer. He combines an engaging analytical skill with a deft ability in description and narrative.

Even through a distance of almost 10 years in the rear-view mirror, Sharansky's observations remain remarkably relevant.

He "saw" nuance in the details and truth in the nuance.

"Simply put, the choice (for Russian Jews in the first week of November 1917) was between national identity, in this case Zionism, and Communism. The two could not co-exist. And the ensuing struggle between the supporters of the two ideas, who in the process became deadly enemies, is only now reaching ironic conclusion. With Jews fleeing the Soviet Union for Israel at a rate approaching 30,000 a month, the cycle is complete: Israel, the realization of the Zionist dream, is now providing a haven for the descendants of those Soviet Jews who in 1917 either chose to put their faith in Bolshevism or simply stayed behind because they had no choice…

"We move two generations forward… The wheel of history had turned full circle. The grandparents dreamed of Israel. The parents thought they could really build a better world in Communist Russia. And the children were finding out the hard way that the grandparents were right. Isolated and discriminated against, third-generation Soviet Jews began to discover the importance of national identity. They began to realize that thanks to those who had chosen the path of Jewish nationalism, they now had a place to go…

"Over generations, the Zionist idea has undergone a number of transformations. Its original idealism may somehow have been lost. But only because of the success of Zionism, as embodied in the creation of the State of Israel, will one million or more Soviet Jews escape burial under the falling rubble of Communism."

Russian Jews continue to arrive in Israel every day, as do Jews from other parts of the former Soviet Union and other lands.

This is only one detail of the countless many in the great and flawed, inspiring and infuriating State of Israel.

Let us celebrate this "work of art" still in progress.

CORRECTION

Words are the tools of journalists. With our words we inform and opine. The extent to which our information is reliable and our opinion offered without ruse or guile is the extent to which the paper will hold onto its credibility.

That is why the way we use our words is always the most important of all considerations at The CJN.

Last week (April 9) in our front page story "Holocaust museum may be derailed," there was one specific paragraph in which we did not use our words with requisite care.

We wrote: "Armenians accuse the Turks of responsibility for the century's first genocide in which tens of thousands of Armenians were slaughtered."

The slaughter of the Armenians by the Turks at the beginning of this century is hardly a matter of accusation. It is a matter of fact and of historical record.

We did not intend to convey the impression that any doubt attached to the matter. But our words may have left that impression.

We apologize.

Boys Town Jerusalem celebrates 50th anniversary

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The 50th anniversary of Boys Town Jerusalem is being celebrated here this week with a tribute dinner honoring Leslie Dan and marking the establishment of the Dan Family Computer Resource Centre.

The resource centre will serve the institution's junior high students and help them become "totally computer literate," said Denise Gold, executive director, Canadian Friends of Boys Town Jerusalem.

The school, founded for child survivors of the Holocaust and situated on an 18-acre campus in the Bayit Vegan neighborhood of Jerusalem, serves 1,100 students from 45 countries, including many from Russia, Ethiopia and the Arab countries. Three-quarters of them still come from economically disadvantaged families.

Its graduates are "well-rounded young people much sought after by the air force," said Gold. The school encompasses junior high, high school, a two-year post-high school engineering project and a post-high school yeshiva.

Students receive both technical and religious education and are taught that "there's more to life than academic knowledge," she noted. Both sports and community volunteer work are an integral part of the Boys Town program.

"Kids from very disadvantaged backgrounds are given an opportunity to make a good life for themselves. We've got [alumni who are] generals, professors, teachers who've come back to teach at the school, engineers, business people, doctors and lawyers," said Gold.

"There've been thousands of graduates over the years. They have strengthened their families, their communities, and have really stood in good stead for the people of Israel as well."

The Canadian Friends group was formed in 1967 to raise funds and awareness about Boys Town. Its largest contingent is in Toronto, where its office is based. There are also sizable groups of supporters in Vancouver, Winnipeg and Montreal.

This week's dinner is being held April 15 at Beth Tzedec Synagogue. The organization is honoring Dan for his philanthropy in the Jewish and non-Jewish communities both here and abroad, said Gold.

A Hungarian-born Holocaust survivor and war refugee, Dan is the founder of Novopharm, Canada's largest generic pharmaceutical manufacturer.

Canadian Friends' founding chair Eric Exton is also being honored, Gold added.

Guest speaker is Malcolm Hoenlein, vice-chair of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations, the umbrella body for 55 national U.S. Jewish groups.

UJA names campaign co-chairs

TORONTO — Veteran campaigners David Engel and Mel Wolfond have been named as co-chairs for UJA Federation's Campaign 2000.

David Engel

Engel, a Montreal native, moved to Toronto 15 years ago and continued to be active in the Jewish community. An award-winning graduate of the UJA Federation Leadership Development Program, Engel has served as vice-chair of the 1997 and 1998 annual campaign, co-chair of the Walk for Israel, and chair of several divisions. He was also the recipient of UJA Federation's Granofsky Award.

Engel, who owns a specialty printing business, Innovative Graphics Inc., which produces direct marketing material, is married to Judy and has three children.

"Coming up through the ranks of UJA Federation, I've learned that what's really significant is getting people involved. It's not only important to make a donation, but to volunteer as well," he says.

Wolfond, originally from Guelph, served as chair of that city's United Israel Appeal campaign during the Six Day War. He became active as a UJA Federation canvasser after moving to Toronto 15 years ago. An architecture graduate, Wolfond chose a career in real estate and financial services. He and his wife, Pedie, have three sons and eight grandchildren.

Mel Wolfond

"I will do everything I can to make this a successful campaign," says Wolfond. "I've met with our campaign past chairs, and look forward to their assistance."

Last year's UJA Federation community Campaign for Fifty, had the goal of raising $50 million annually by 2001, and closed at $41 million. Campaign 2000 will again focus on three areas to which additional funds will be allocated: strengthening Jewish identity, assisting the vulnerable, and rescuing Jews in danger.

Campaign 2000 will kick off on Aug. 30, 1999.

Weinrib a leading constitutional scholar

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms – a landmark in Canada's maturation as a nation – has piqued Lorraine Eisenstat Weinrib's intellectual curiosity since its enactment in 1982.

Indeed, she has made a career out of analyzing its significance, not only in Canada but in Israel.

One of Canada's leading constitutional law scholars, she believes that the charter serves two broad purposes.

Protecting citizens against the state and minorities against parliamentary majorities, it strengthens Canada's democratic system of government.

Overseas, the charter is widely regarded as a prototype for countries, such as Israel and South Africa, making the transition from a legislative to a constitutional democracy.

"Canada's charter has become a model for constitutional development all over the world because it offers a distinctive arrangement for judicial and legislative functions, respects equal human dignity, affirms identity and group affiliation and regards the state positively," explained the 51-year-old University of Toronto law professor.

Israel, she said, may yet integrate these norms into its emerging constitution. And if it ever does, Weinrib may be able to claim part of the credit.

In the past few years, Weinrib has given talks to Israeli jurists and academics about the charter and its place in Canadian jurisprudence. In 1995, for example, she delivered a series of lectures for 80 senior Israeli judges. The event was organized by none other than Aharon Barak, president of Israel's Supreme Court.

In the same spirit, Weinrib has arranged visits of Israelis to Canada to study Canadian constitutional law and practice. As far as she can ascertain, Israelis have a high regard for Canada's charter.

Weinrib contends that Israel's best interests would be served by a constitution.

Lorraine Weinrib

The building blocks of a constitution, taking the form of basic laws, are already in place. But a living, breathing constitution still lies beyond the horizon.

"It's a step by step process," she said. "I have no idea when Israel will have a constitution. I'm not sure anyone can predict that."

Weinrib, whose teaching load encompasses courses ranging from constitutional litigation to administrative law, was born in Toronto into a Russian family which immigrated to Canada in the early 1900s.

Louis, her late father, was a bookkeeper. Helen, her mother, received a BA in Jewish studies from York University when she was 70. During the Depression, neither of her parents could afford the luxury of attending university.

Nevertheless, they always stressed the value of education and never failed to remind her of the need to be morally independent.

An excellent student, Weinrib attended Sir Sandford Fleming Secondary School, was valedictorian of the graduating class, and entered York University with an Ontario scholarship.

She graduated with a BA in classics, a discipline which initially enabled her to understand the cultural transitions through which the ancient world passed, but which later gave her a better understanding of the law.

She enjoyed classics immensely, but did not pursue it beyond the undergraduate level because she doubted whether she could land a position in the field.

Yet classics, she shyly disclosed, proved to be crucial in her own personal life. Her husband, Ernest, was a University of Toronto classics professor, and she met him when she was a student. Like Weinrib, he, too, switched to law.

They have three children: Aliza, 21, a U of T philosophy major; Sara, 18, a freshman at the U of T; and Jacob, a 16-year-old high school student.

With a U of T law degree in hand, Weinrib joined the Ontario civil service, steadily rising in the ranks from a student-at-law to deputy director of the Attorney General's constitutional law and policy department.

Working in a variety of advisory and litigation capacities, she was directly involved in the process which culminated in the adoption of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, a path-breaking document which provides for fundamental rights, democratic rights, legal rights, mobility rights, equality and gender rights, and linguistic rights.

In the leadup to its entrenchment in the constitution, she made numerous appearances before the Supreme Court of Canada. One of her most important cases turned on the now-famous "notwithstanding" clause.

In 1984-85, Weinrib finished a master's degree in law at Yale University. "It was quite an undertaking," she said, referring to the weight of her studies and the responsibility of caring for three children.

At Yale, Weinrib developed a keener appreciation of the charter as a vehicle for preserving constitutional rights. While there, she wrote a number of scholarly pieces about the charter. This, in turn, pushed Weinrib to the realization that her talents might be better suited in a university setting. She joined the U of T in 1988, and she has never regretted the career change.

As she put it: "It made more sense to have an academic job

Yom Hazikaron

Nearly 20,000 soldiers have fallen in defence of the state and the people of Israel. The photo from the Haganah archives set into this editorial is the graphically tragic record of one of them, an immigrant who had only days, if not hours before, arrived from Cyprus in 1948. He fought and died in one of the many battles for Latrun. His fingers still curled in the pain of his final moment, the raw soldier lies on the shards of rock and the detritus of battle, his life extinguished, his lips kissing the earth of the homeland he held in his hands for mere moments.

The battle for Latrun was part of the battle for Jerusalem. Here, in the Jerusalem front, the fledgling Israeli army suffered its greatest losses. The struggle to relieve Jerusalem from the siege imposed by the Arab Legion, centered on the Latrun police fortress that commanded the road to Jerusalem before it ascended near Sha'ar Hagai into the mountains.

In his book, A History of the Israeli Army, Ze'ev Schiff wrote: "The IDF attacked the police station five times, including once supported by a number of tanks, but each assault on the fortress was driven back. Some 200 men sacrificed their lives in these battles, the most costly attack being that of a brigade that had been organized only a few days earlier and consisted of many new immigrants who had just come off the boats."

The photo does not record a name for the soldier, only that he fought and fell. But every soldier has a name, just as every life has a soul, and every soul, a purpose under heaven. May the soul of this fallen soldier, and all fallen soldiers, be bound up in eternal life; may his memory be for blessing; and may his name, son of Israel, live on forever.

Yom Ha'atzmaut

In the Tel Aviv Museum, on the fifth day of Iyar, 1948, nine days before the soldier in the above photo was killed in battle on the field near the police fortress at Latrun, David Ben-Gurion proclaimed the creation of the State of Israel. The scene of the proclamation is enshrined in most every major photo archive, even as it is in most every knowing Jewish heart of that generation.

The stocky Ben-Gurion, his familiar, white shock of hair neatly unkempt, is behind a microphone at the dais with 11 members of the national administration. Fourteen members of the national council are in front of him. He is the only one standing. Above him on the draped wall, is a portrait of Theodor Herzl, elegant, dignified, peering with his dark eyes into a far-off horizon that the man standing below is about to embrace.

Ben-Gurion holds the declaration of independence in his left hand. It is Friday afternoon. Shabbat is approaching. There is an urgency that can be felt in the room, in the streets outside the museum, and in the rooms around the world wherever people are gathered by their radios waiting to hear the words that Ben-Gurion is about to pronounce.

At exactly 4 p.m. he begins: "I shall now read to you the Scroll of the Establishment of the State which has passed its first reading by the National Council," he announces. "Eretz Yisrael was the birthplace of the Jewish people. Here, their spiritual, religious, and political identity was shaped. Here, they first attained to statehood, created cultural values of national and universal significance and gave to the world the eternal Book of Books..."

Ben-Gurion spoke for 17 minutes. Those 17 minutes echoed around the world. They reverberate until today and will do so for all time to come.

Struck by silence of Canadian Jews on Kosovo

I never thought I would see the horrible images of ethnic cleansing in Europe that I see taking place day after day in Kosovo. I cannot help but be reminded of the stories my grandfather, a Dachau survivor, told me when I was a little girl.

I never thought that, in the face of such inhumanity and suffering, the voices of outrage from Canadian Jews would be so conspicuous by their absence. Silence in the face of ethnic cleansing is complicity and condonation. If this is the case, the future for all of us is bleak indeed.

Meri Miojevic
Toronto

Kosovo is a new element in seder story

This year my recounting of the story of Passover has a modern-day equivalent, the people of Kosovo. These mainly ethnic Muslim Albanians are being killed and driven from the homes that they have lived in for centuries. Their pleas for autonomy, peace and freedom were rewarded by an iron fist response: ethnic cleansing.

Barely 50 years ago, the Holocaust killed six million of my people. The Jews were destroyed because they were different. Today the Serbs annihilate their former Muslim neighbors, women and children are separated from their teen-aged sons, and husbands suddenly disappear.

How do I try to explain to my children and our university student guests that man's history of intolerance still exists? The Pharaohs and Hitlers of the past live on in a new tyrant, Slobodan Milosovic, who sadly has the power of life and death over his neighbors and his own people. In the Passover Haggadah, we recount the story of how God sent the 10 plagues to punish Pharaoh and the people of Egypt who enslaved, brutalized and killed the Jews. Today we have the modern equivalent to the plagues in the form of bombs and rockets to try and destroy the military might of the Yugoslavian armed forces. The NATO forces with United States, Great Britain, Italy, Germany and Canada cannot stand idly by and watch a people annihilated.

I have nothing but praise for our government, which has had to abandon the role of peace keeper to stem the slaughter.

Leonard A. Lesser
London

Why does Winnipeg produce Jews of distinction?

As I read the article on Sara Kreindler, who won a Rhodes Scholarship, the second year in a row for a Jewish university student from Winnipeg (CJN, Jan. 7), I reflected on how the small Jewish community there – 25,000 Jews in its heyday of the 1940s and 1950s, now 15,000 – has produced so many illustrious Jews.

They include tycoon Izzy Asper, leader of the Liberal party in Manitoba, 1970-75; Ruben Bellan, economist; Allan Blye, producer of American TV programs including The Smothers Brothers Show; David Golden, first Jewish deputy minister in Ottawa; Beryl Fox, film director and producer; Allan Gottlieb, diplomat; Sondra Gotlieb, writer; Monty Hall, television performer and producer; A.A. Heaps, leader of the Winnipeg General Strike in 1919 and parliamentarian, 1925-40; Jack London, law professor; Jack Ludwig, writer; Bernard Ostry, mandarin; Sylvia Ostry,economist; Perry Rosemond, director of Royal Canadian Air Farce TV show; Ernest Sirluck, president of University of Manitoba, 1970-76; Sidney Spivak, leader of the Conservative party in Manitoba, 1971-75; David Steinberg, comedian; Adele Wiseman, writer; and Larry Zolf, writer and broadcaster.

What is equally astonishing is that Winnipeg had eight synagogues that conducted a High Holy Day appeal for Israel Bonds. New York City, with more than 1.5 million Jews — a hundred times as many — had only three synagogues that conducted this appeal!

Now, if we could only discover the alchemy at work in this Canadian city and replicate it in other Jewish communities throughout the world!

Moshav band united Jewish students

The tremendous success of the Moshav Band concert (March 20) in a Toronto nightclub attended by 500 Jewish students, is news that must be shared and celebrated by all Jews. The students came to hear the popular band from Shlomo Carlebach's moshav in Israel, who performed their unique brand of Jewish music, starting with a stirring havdalah ceremony.

But what really made the concert spectacular was the immeasurable joy that permeated the evening as Jewish students from across the spectrum of affiliation came together to celebrate their Jewishness through the music.

Perspectives

The Jewish interest in Kosovo

By ELIAHU SALPETER
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Slobodan Milosevic is not Marshal Tito, as supporters of the president of what's left of Yugoslavia would like others to believe. And Kosovo is not Jerusalem – nor is it the Galilee, as Foreign Minister Ariel Sharon is trying to make it out to be.

The Jewish people, in both Israel and the Diaspora, have a deep affinity for the Serbian people, who fought behind Tito in the war against Nazi Germany. The sight of German planes now bombing Belgrade tugs at the heartstrings of all who remember World War II. But such instinctive reactions can be fodder for manipulation by propagandists. Israelis also know that opposition to a leader's policies does not necessarily mean hostility toward the people in whose name he speaks.

The communist apparatchik Milosevic hadn't even reached nursery school when Tito's partisans defeated the Nazi invaders. What similarity is there between the leader who came to power as an acclaimed partisan commander and the bank clerk who first became a political wheeler-dealer and then built himself up by means of ethnic incitement against his nation's minorities? Even when Tito joined with Nasser, Nehru and Indonesia's Sukarno to form the bloc of "nonaligned nations," an international grouping that was exceedingly hostile to Israel almost from the start, Israelis and Jews the world over still gratefully remembered Yugoslavia's good deeds during the war.

It's worth remembering that the image of the Kosovars as an upstart minority that suddenly revolted is not quite accurate. Ninety percent of the population in Kosovo is Albanian, with the rest made up of Serbs and Montenegrins. Kosovo had autonomy within the framework of the Yugoslav Federation before Milosevic cancelled this autonomy. The revolt spread after the Serbian government, with the aid of the local Serb minority, began what it termed a "war on terrorists." The west did not come out in favor of Kosovo's gaining independence from Serbia, but it did take a stand against massacres and ethnic cleansing, after Milosevic refused to accept an agreement to renew Kosovo's autonomy.

The Albanian underground is certainly not a group of saints and it has carried out acts of vengeance against Serbs in Kosovo. But it's worth remembering – and learning from the fact – that the extremists received much sympathy among the moderate Albanian population because of Serb terror.

When a delegation from the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai Brith visited Moscow in late March to persuade the Russian government to take action against rising anti-Semitism and cease providing nuclear assistance to Iran, Russian Foreign Minister Igor Ivanov spoke of Kosovo in his reply. He said that American assistance to the Albanian Muslims serves the interests of the world's Islamic extremists.

"The Albanian Liberation Movement is a fundamentalist movement supported by the likes of Osama Bin Laden and Hezbollah. When this business in Albania is finished, they'll all point their rifles in another direction," Ivanov told the director-general of the Anti-Defamation League.

Milosevic's apologists made a similar argument when Serb forces were carrying out a campaign of ethnic cleansing against the Muslims in Bosnia. Ever since that war ended with the signing of the American-arbitrated Dayton agreement, we've heard nothing more about the "Muslim International" in Yugoslavia, perhaps because the Americans forced the Bosnian government to evict the volunteer soldiers who had come from Afghanistan and Arab countries from the area it controlled. The Bosnians even claimed that it was Serb terrorist activity that propelled them to seek out the help of the fundamentalists. The same thing could happen in Kosovo.

There is no basis for the argument made by our foreign minister, as reported in the press, that "the moment Israel supports this kind of action (NATO intervention), it could find itself the next victim." Democratic nations do not use force lightly. They only resort to it in the face of repeated and increased provocation. They didn't act against Hitler after his army entered Austria, nor after the occupation of Czechoslovakia, but only after he attacked Poland. NATO did not act when Belgrade used force to try to prevent Slovenia and Croatia from breaking off. It only made threats (and activated peacekeeping forces) in the Serbian war against Bosnian independence. NATO bombings of Serbia only started when the slaughter and mass expulsions in Kosovo began.

The Israeli government's Kosovo is not in the Galilee, but – if a comparison can be made – in the West Bank. It is to be hoped that the foreign minister is not thinking in terms of "transfer" or ethnic cleansing, either of which could trigger a harsh western response.

For Israel, the Kosovo precedent has another positive, long-term significance: It serves as proof of the authenticity of American commitment to act when a victim's existence is aggressively threatened – a commitment that had fallen deeply into question in the wake of Vietnam and Somalia. It is safe to assume that Baghdad and Tehran have paid attention to the price of aggression, even aggression by means of conventional weapons.

But the most important Israeli interest in what is happening in Kosovo is the Jewish interest. It has already been said a number of times that as Jews, we cannot remain indifferent to the horrors occurring in Asia or Africa, and certainly not to those happening in the heart of Europe. The pictures of husbands and sons being herded into stadiums are to demonstrate the urgency of the situation to anyone who still needs convincing.

Of course, Serbia is not Nazi Germany, and the trains are arriving at the Macedonian border, not Auschwitz. But Jews, more than any other people, have reason to support the precedent now taking shape in Kosovo. Chief Rabbi Yisrael Lau was right when he said, "A nation that was a victim of the Holocaust cannot remain indifferent to the present genocide. It must mobilize world public opinion." But what NATO bombers are doing now negates Rabbi Lau's pessimistic assessment that the world hasn't learned a thing from the Holocaust.

The rough draft of a new concept of international law is now being written in Kosovo. It declares that even a sovereign state cannot do whatever it pleases against its citizens. That horrible deeds against ethnic minorities living inside its borders are no longer an "internal matter," but rather a matter that concerns the entire democratic world. That it takes much less than the destruction of millions of people in gas chambers to qualify as a crime against humanity that justifies – and requires – international intervention.

The Jewish people and the Jewish state have a supreme interest in seeing these new norms take hold

Deri casts a large shadow

Since moving to Israel in 1990, I have not been able to escape Aryeh Deri. Nor has the rest of the nation. As the head of Shas and the country's top political wheeler-dealer, Deri has played a key role in the making and breaking of governments over the past decade.

Robert Sarner in Jerusalem

It didn't seem to matter that in 1990, when Deri was interior minister, police began investigating him for financial irregularities. It didn't matter that in 1993, he was forced to leave the cabinet after being indicted on corruption charges. Nothing seemed to get in Deri's way – until recently when he was convicted of bribery, aggravated fraud, threatening witnesses and suborning justice.

In the lead-up to this week's anxiously awaited sentencing of Deri, it's hard to say what's been more distressing – the crimes for which Deri was convicted last month or the response of politicians to his conviction.

It's a measure of the man's power and influence that most politicians have been uncharacteristically reticent about Deri's documented lies, cover-up and perversion of the legal system. Such is his almost mystical hold on the country's political establishment – and the state's purse strings.

Obviously, the fact that the country is in the throes of an election campaign helps account for the silence of candidates who don't want to jeopardize a future coalition deal with Shas by alienating supporters of Deri. And one thing the 40-year-old, Moroccan-born Deri does not lack is supporters.

Starting with Rabbi Ovadia Yosef, Shas' spiritual mentor and former Sephardi chief rabbi of Israel, Deri can count hundreds of thousands of Sephardi Israelis who feel indebted to him for diverting billions of shekels in state budgets to Shas-sponsored religious and educational activities.

That helps explain the phlegmatic reaction to Deri's crimes, of the candidates for prime minister and virtually all those on their Knesset lists. Never before has compassion flowed so generously among politicians.

It would have almost been touching if it weren't so revolting. Upholding public trust and moral standards seemed to count for nothing as Knesset members expressed sympathy for Deri, as if he were some innocent victim.

Almost no one condemned his misdeeds, nor said a word for his victims or the millions of shekels his deceit cost the country.

Senior Labor MK Haim Ramon said the Jerusalem District Court's conviction of Deri was a mistake, despite the overwhelming evidence behind the verdict. Seemingly lost amid all this earnest commiseration was the fact that Deri had brought his misfortune upon himself through corrupt behavior so egregious even his high-priced lawyers couldn't get him off the hook.

Lamentably, few politicians dared state the obvious. A notable exception was Likud MK Michael Eitan, who criticized prime ministerial candidates for their stance on Deri and suggested that after being convicted of such serious crimes, Deri shouldn't be allowed to head a political party.

"Benjamin Netanyahu, Ehud Barak and Yitzhak Mordechai were all brave commanders in the army," said Eitan, "but they did not bring that bravery to bear in the political arena. Each of them reacted to this serious phenomenon with a forked tongue and such weak reactions."

Eitan added that the main political parties should end any contact or public activity involving Deri. "This is someone who has been declared a serious criminal; a man who tried to undermine the democratic foundations of the state. One can't just close one's eyes and ignore such things."

In Israel, one certainly can. Eitan's words were a lone voice in the darkness, one for which he received a public tongue-lashing from Netanyahu.

Their party, the Likud, also issued a formal statement, distancing itself from Eitan's comments.

The Labor party was no less forgiving of Deri's crimes. Only MK Yossi Beilin spoke out: "I have no problem saying that since his conviction, Deri is a criminal and as such we shouldn't conduct coalition talks with him."

True to form, Shas leaders and their followers denounced the Deri verdict as further proof, in their eyes, of a bankrupt judicial system (already under virulent attack by the haredim, including Shas), and yet another episode in the Ashkenazi persecution of the Sephardi community.

In their 920-page verdict, the three judges (one of whom was religious and Sephardi) stated unanimously that Deri committed some of the most serious crimes ever proven against a senior political figure. Whether or not he goes to jail, it would be reassuring to think that at least Deri's conduct has ended his political career. Don't bank on it, given the current norms of behavior in Israeli public life.

Corpus Separatum of the Absurd

On Nov. 29, 1947, the United Nations General Assembly adopted Resolution 181, which called for the partition of British mandated Palestine into independent Arab and Jewish states. The City of Jerusalem was defined as a "Corpus Separatum" – a separate entity under international control.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

The nature of this international control was not defined (and highly theoretical), and the plan was never implemented. After the Jewish leadership reluctantly accepted the compromise, the Arabs angrily rejected any Jewish state, and accelerated the war to destroy Israel.

Then, as now, the UN and the international community did nothing to enforce its resolutions, to protect or aid the Jews, or to punish the Arabs for violating the UN charter and the prohibitions on military aggression.

The Arab invasion and ensuing war obliterated the plan and any practical application of UN Resolution 181. As a result of the war, the boundaries of partition were altered beyond recognition. Armistice agreements were signed between Israel and each of the Arab countries, and these became the new legal basis for relations between the states.

Jordan conquered, occupied and annexed east Jerusalem, and evicted the surviving residents of the Jewish Quarter ("ethnic cleansing"), while Israel established its capital in the western part of the city. The internationalization of Jerusalem, which was never a workable proposal, even in 1947, was no longer on anyone's agenda.

In 1967, following the war which was triggered by another Arab attempt to destroy Israel, UN Security Council Resolution 242, based on the formula of "land for peace" and mutual recognition, replaced all earlier UN resolutions. Following the 1973 war, Resolution 338, which included similar language, was adopted.

However, 52 years after the idea of a Corpus Separatum was introduced in the UN, it has been rediscovered, by a combination of western countries (including Canada) and the Arabs.

By the same logic, they should also support a return to the partition borders and the resurrection of the 6,000 Israelis killed in the 1948 war, as well as the thousands of additional casualties, on both sides, from all of the subsequent wars and terrorism. The attempt to justify changes in Jerusalem on the basis of UN Resolution 181 is clearly absurd.

The one place where international law and norms could be applied to Jerusalem without violating the basic foundations of common sense, is in the documentation of atrocities between 1948 and 1967.

During the period of Arab occupation of the Old City, the Jewish quarter was systematically destroyed. Long after the war ended, ancient synagogues and other sites were deliberately desecrated, and Jewish gravestones from the Mount of Olives were used to pave roads.

Despite the guarantees of free access to the Holy Places for members of all religions, Jews were systematically barred from entry, and the Western Wall, the last remnant of the Temple and the holiest site for Jews, was deliberately used as a garbage dump.

Yet, during the years of the Arab occupation and desecration of the Old City, there were no protests from any international body. The UN Security Council saw no reason to issue a resolution when Jewish and Israeli rights were violated. The Vatican, now so eager to be involved in the determination of Jerusalem's status, saw nothing unusual when Jews were barred from their religious sites.

Any serious investigation of the status of Jerusalem will clearly show that since 1967, when the city was reunited and the Arab occupation ended, Jerusalem has been managed fairly and openly.

Adherents of all religions have had unfettered access their holy sites, and the Moslem mosques and Christian churches of all denominations have full autonomy, without interference from the Israeli government. In practice, Jerusalem is already internationalized.

If international law and norms of behavior have something to contribute regarding Jerusalem, then surely the starting point should be an investigation of the Arab occupation.

Who was responsible for the destruction of the synagogues and the desecration of graves? (Many of these people are still alive.) Why did the international community remain silent when Jewish rights in Jerusalem were abused and ignored? A commission to examine and report on these questions would contribute to a realistic understanding of the central issues that need to be addressed regarding Jerusalem's past.

In contrast, the attempts to twist and contort outdated and irrelevant UN resolutions to fit some obscure objectives regarding Jerusalem does not help to legitimize the role of the UN and international law. On the contrary, such efforts further discredit the international community and the United Nations.

A visit to Birmingham

It was my pleasure to spend some time in Birmingham, Ala., where I gave a series of lectures.

Birmingham is the bastion of the Old South, and while there I had occasion to visit one of its landmarks, the Civil Rights Institute. It is dedicated to the memory of Birmingham's role in the civil rights movement.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Unfortunately, from 1955 to 1965, that role was marked by the fierce opposition of most of its white citizens to the emerging struggle of the black community. The latter strove for the most fundamental civic rights and some measure of human dignity. The name of the police commissioner, "Bull" Connor and the governor, George Wallace, are inscribed in the annals of ignominy: fire hoses mowing down black demonstrators, lynchings estimated at about 100, and a legislature enshrining discrimination by legalizing it.

The institute made available the copy of a letter that was addressed to the black community and dated Dec. 5, 1955. It read: "Another Negro woman has been arrested and thrown into jail because she refused to get up out of her seat on the bus for a white person to sit down. It is the second time since the Claudette Colbert case that a Negro woman has been arrested for the same thing. This has to be stopped.

"Negroes have rights too, for if Negroes did not ride the buses, they could not operate. Three-fourths of the riders are Negroes, yet we are arrested or have to stand over empty seats. If we do not do something to stop these arrests, they will continue.

"This woman's case will come up on Monday. We are therefore asking every Negro to stay off the buses Monday in protest. You can afford to stay out of school for one day if you have no other way to go except by bus. You can also afford to stay out of town for one day. If you work, take a cab, or walk. But please, children and grown-ups, don't ride the bus at all on Monday."

A few years later, Birmingham became known as "Bomingham," because the 16th Street church suffered a bombing attack that killed four little girls attending Sunday school. The Civil Rights Institute is built across the street from the church. I visited it and felt the presence, not only of the dead, but also of the living spirit of Martin Luther King Jr., who gave some of his most inspired sermons from that pulpit. The institute itself is a measure of the great change which has come to the city, but a measure of segregation is still a fact. Blacks live in the city itself (which for a long time has had black mayors), but whites have increasingly moved to the suburbs.

I left the institute after having listened to King's famous speech in which the words, "I have a dream" and "Let freedom ring," were repeated with insistence. It reminded me when King spoke at Holy Blossom, and challenged his listeners to attain a new level of civic militancy – militancy not violence. In my mind, there has always been a parallel between the striving of the black community and that of the Jews. No one can truly liberate a people, unless it liberates itself.

Britain's mandate in Palestine examined

Routing Ottoman forces, British troops, commanded by Gen. Edmund Allenby, marched into Jerusalem on Dec. 9, 1917, establishing a critical beachhead and forming the nucleus of a League of Nations mandate in Palestine.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Scholars have produced an avalanche of monographs and books about the mandate, whose existence was marked by an escalating level of animosity and violence between Arabs and Jews.

Scarcely any of these studies have focused on the British officials who administered this strategic piece of real estate. Captivated by the increasingly bitter struggles that convulsed Palestine following the issuance of the Balfour Declaration on Nov. 2, 1917, a document which envisioned a Jewish homeland there, historians have generally dealt with the political aspects of the mandate. A.J. Sherman, who was born in Jerusalem and whose father was a mandate official, concentrates on the personalities in an eminently balanced book entitled Mandate Days: British Lives in Palestine 1918-1948 (Thames and Hudson).

Living up to his objective, Sherman paints a nuanced portrait of the civilians and soldiers who found themselves in Palestine during the period under review. But inevitably, he grapples with the pressing political issues that other historians have addressed directly or glancingly. Strictly speaking, then, Mandate Days covers more ground than expected.

In common with their compatriots elsewhere in the far-flung British empire, officials in Palestine usually mixed among themselves. Almost none of them could speak Hebrew, and the ones who knew Arabic were rarely fluent. Nevertheless, it's clear that the majority of British preferred the company of Arabs to that of Jews. Palestinian Arabs were felt to be attractive by virtue of their physical courage, pride in their traditions and exquisite courtesy, generous hospitality, loyalty and well-developed sense of personal honor and of humor.

These beliefs, Sherman observes, were hardly shaken by events – the Arab Revolt (1936 to 1939), during which scores of British troops and policemen were killed, or the tepid and sometimes hostile Arab response to Britain's needs during World War II.

With the exception of native-born Zionist settlers, whose toughness and brashness invariably inspired respect, Jews were considered less appealing, particularly those of central European origin. They were perceived as tense and bourgeois, bereft of humor, seldom open and straightforward and lacking the small talk and ease of manner that lubricated social encounters.

"One cannot help having the greatest admiration for the Jews in their industry, their boundless enthusiasm and their loyalty to each other," Sherman quotes a British administrator as saying. "It is strange that so intelligent and gifted a race should as a whole be so completely devoid of tact, which has made their relations with both British and Arabs difficult."

As Sherman suggests, such attitudes were a function of at least two factors: anti-Semitism and an unwillingness by Jews to succumb to "British charm and moral leadership." Given their jaundiced view of Jews, it comes as no surprise that most British functionaries were pro-Arab and had no great sympathy for a Jewish homeland in Palestine, a concept from which Britain gradually withdrew. According to Sherman, they considered the idea contrary to Britain's wider interests in the Middle East.

For most British in Palestine, Zionism was associated dimly with Bolshevism, international conspiracy theories and notions of widespread Jewish influence.

But, Sherman adds, a few "exceptional individuals," such as the legendary Orde Wingate, went against the grain of British thinking, and embraced Jews and Zionism.

Turning to a related topic, Sherman explains that many British officials of Jewish descent fared badly, being under constant attack from both Arabs and Jews for presumed partiality, disloyalty or double dealings.

Norman Bentwich, the attorney general, a man of integrity, was forced to resign because he was deemed too controversial. On the other hand, Sir Herbert Samuel, the first British high commissioner, served out his term.

From the outset, as Sherman correctly states, the mandate was shot through with ambiguities. As a result, the discord pitting Jews against Arabs grew exponentially.

He theorizes that the communal strife in 1929 was a watershed, confirming the Arabs' implacable hostility to Zionism and shattering the delusion that Britain could foster a sense of Palestinian citizenship among Jews and Arabs.

The fighting prompted the high commissioner, Sir John Chancellor, to conclude that the Balfour Declaration had been "a colossal blunder," unjust to Arabs and impossible to fulfil evenhandedly.

In this spirit, the British government, on the eve of World War II, released a White Paper that drastically limited Jewish immigration to, and land purchases in, Palestine.

These policies, a sop to Arab opinion, unfolded with tragic consequences against the backdrop of the Holocaust. On Feb. 25, 1942, the Struma, an unseaworthy vessel filled with hundreds of Romanian Jews trying to reach Palestine, sank in the Black Sea. The two survivors were refused admittance to Palestine, an event which destroyed the last vestiges of what had been Britain's special relationship with the Zionist movement.

During the war, British troops poured into Palestine, making it the principal supply depot and rest and recreation centre for the entire Middle East. By 1942, private cars had been banned from roads and food rationing had gone into effect. But compared to the wartime austerities in Britain, Sherman writes, life in Palestine was relatively easy.

Palestine was comparatively sheltered from the war, but in the summer of 1940, the conflict hit home when the Italian air force bombed Haifa's oil refineries and accidentally attacked Tel Aviv, claiming countless casualties.

With the terrorist bombing of the King David Hotel in Jerusalem and the campaign of insurrection launched by the Irgun and the Stern Gang, Britain's frayed relations with the Yishuv worsened in the post-war period.

Immediately after the King David atrocity, Sir Evelyn Barker, the commander of the British army in Palestine, forbade soldiers to associate with Jews. The 1947 Exodus incident, during which British naval boats intercepted a ship with Jewish refugees bound for Palestine, exacerbated the situation.

Orde Charles Wingate

Despite the growing burden of maintaining an outpost there, the consensus among senior British military officers was that Palestine should be kept permanently as a strategic base and an anchor of British interests in the region. But such sentiments carried no weight in London, and subsequently, Britain notified the United Nations of its intention to give up Palestine.

In the waning months of the mandate, there was a sharp deterioration of morale, as some soldiers assaulted Jewish and Arab civilians, illegally sold arms and ammunition and deserted to join Arab or criminal bands.

The mandate came to an ignominious close in 1948, in an atmosphere of bitterness and confusion. As Sir Alan Cunningham – the last British high commissioner – got ready to leave, David Ben-Gurion, the dominant figure in the Yishuv, prepared the momentous speech he would deliver to formally announce the proclamation of Israeli statehood.

Relocating often frightening for immigrant children

By MICHAEL BRIKS

Guest Voices

You are 6 years of age, and you've just been told by your momma, or your papa, perhaps your bubbie or zayde, that in a little while you are going to move far, far away. You don't quite understand why you are moving, and you can't quite grasp where you are moving to, other than that this magical place is supposed to be better than where you are living now, whatever that means.

Your momma now spends countless hours sorting out "stuff" that will be going with you, and "stuff" that will remain – to be given to others. Nothing to go to waste.

Relatives come and go – they have tears in their eyes. They tell you that they will visit soon (whatever soon means) and that you are going to be happy, far, far away, even though as happiness goes, you are doing quite fine where you are now.

Close neighbors usher in your playmates to bid farewell. Awkwardly they sit with you. One child graciously offers a biscuit, another the small wooden car to which you claimed ownership several arguments ago. The playmates are not reassuring; somehow they sense that they will never see you again, never play with you again. This is the final goodbye.

You are 6 years old and you are about to embark on a journey that will lead you to a new life; new experiences, new neighborhood, new school, new synagogue. You are pale. You feel very small and frightened. It is difficult to speak. So much is whirling about you – packing, kvetching, packing, laughter, packing, tears – tears and hugs. Everything uncertain. Everything changing. The plight of the immigrant child – not a chance. A family move from Toronto to Vancouver; from Winnipeg to Ottawa or perhaps from Windsor to Halifax. Stressful indeed, traumatic...perhaps.

To your delight, little one, you soon discover that "magic land" looks strangely familiar. There are shuls, a Jewish Community Centre, restaurants, stores and shopping malls. People sound the same; drink water from the faucet, use flush toilets and buy all sorts of things with the same money you use. Kids flock to playground swings and shiny plastic slides, and bat balls in groomed grassy fields – just like back home. They even pull their ballcaps on tightly and backwards, wear faded jeans and chew bubble gum.

Thank goodness mamma didn't throw out the baseball glove!

Now picture, if you would, a single day in the life of a newly arrived Jewish immigrant child from Donetsk, or perhaps Kiev or Zvomik...

Making friends on the Web

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

You don't need a computer or a modem to make friends across the world.

People have had pen-pals in far away places since long before the World Wide Web. But the Internet and e-mail have revolutionized pen-pal correspondence, giving it an immediacy undreamed of even a few years ago. Today, how to make friends around the corner or around the world on the Jewish Highway. (Always be prudent on the Highway. Never give out your full name or your street address to a stranger.)

One of the most interesting sites is Virtual Jerusalem Pen Pals, which has an interesting mix of people who are looking for casual friends and more serious relationships [http://join.virtual.co.il/cgi-win/penpals.exe/]. A sampling:

• Judah from Minneapolis: "I have roots in Tunisia. I have recently discovered my Jewish ancestry. Talk to me!"

• Leigh from Sydney: "I'm a 15-year-old female who was born in Israel and moved to Australia when I was six. I would like to speak to anyone around my age about what Judaism is like where you live."

• Menachem from Phoenix: "I'm a Jewish vegan single male looking for a lifetime partner."

Sometimes schools around the world like to maintain contact. Here are some schools in Israel which could be twinned with friends in the Diaspora [http://ietn.snunit.k12.il/byschool.htm/] and [http://web66.coled.umn.edu/schools/IL/Israel.html]. For more Jewish pen-pal sites, see Chabad's Tzivos Hashem [http://www.tzivos-hashem.org/penpals.html], Judaism.com [http://www.judaica.com/jdckids/netpals.html] and the massive ANJY database [http://www.ort.org/anjy/penpals/penpals.htm].

One of the most interesting pen-pal sites I came across is run by Jewish Prisoner Services of Florida [http://www.jewishprisonerservices.org/PenPalHead.html].

Jewish Prisoner Services provides visitation, Judaica and other assistance to Jews in prison. But one of their most important goals is finding pen-pals for Jewish prisoners. Corresponding with a convict may seem unusual, but it can have a lasting impact on the lives of those who are isolated and forgotten by most people in the community. The site quotes Maimonides: "Helping the imprisoned is the loftiest of all charitable acts, superseding all other forms."

Irv Osterer of Nepean, Ont., has written me looking for information on the Internet about hockey in Israel. Sounds like an interesting request on the eve of the playoffs in North America.

I found no site in English, but did come across one Hebrew language Web site devoted to the game. Slapshot [http://up.co.il/users/slap shot/] does a great job of explaining the game to Israelis. Most of the site is devoted to the rules, regulations and stars of the NHL. But there is an overview of the state of the game in Israel [http://up.co.il/users/slapshot/israel.htm].

"Why isn't hockey more popular in Israel?" That question is posed in a delightful Hebrew article from Ha'aretz [http://www.geocities.com/Colosseum/2373/ICE-H.HTM]. "In principle, the game has everything you could dream of in a sport: crowds, tension, an astonishing pace and more than that – what we Israelis love most – a lot of violence and juicy swearing."

If you do get the urge to play hockey in the Holy Land, there may be a place for you at the Roger Neilson Hockey Camp in Israel [http://www.lindsaycomp.on.ca/rnhc/webdoc7.htm]. Every summer, budding stars forego the glorious heat of the Middle Eastern sun to strap on their skates and work out in an air-conditioned rink.

With that kind of devotion, what's next? Hockey Night in Israel?

Bernard Baskin

How many Jews are there in Canada? About 360,000, just a bit more than one percent of the population. Where do they live? Toronto and environs, about 160,000; Montreal, 90,000; Vancouver, 22,000; Winnipeg, 15,000; Ottawa, 12,000. And of course, small numbers in two dozen or so other cities and towns across the country.

In recent years, Montreal and Winnipeg have lost Jewish residents, as Vancouver, Ottawa and Calgary have gained them. Surprisingly, by the mid-1990s there were an estimated 10,000 South African Jews living in Toronto; and more than 40,000 Israelis, mainly in Toronto and Montreal. Unfortunately, the Israeli migrants are largely alienated or uninvolved with community religious and cultural life.

Today, some 40 percent of Canadian Jews are Holocaust survivors or their descendants, probably the highest percentage of any Jewish community outside of Israel.

These statistics are gleaned from Branching Out, an admirable and absorbing history of Jewish life in Canada from 1921 to the present day. It is a sequel to the author's previous book, Taking Root: The Origins of the Canadian Jewish Community, which traces Jewish origins in Canada from their earliest beginnings in the 1760s to 1920.

In 1921, Jews were a group of about 125,000, working or lower middle-class immigrants who lived in ethnic enclaves within major cities.

How that community grew and flourished; the nature of its contributions to Canadian political, social and cultural life; its religious institutions and response to anti-Semitism; its role in the creation and support of Israel; the problems it faced in terms of acculturation and assimilation to the larger community; some of its outstanding personalities and its hopes for the future – these are some of the major themes and concerns of this readable and accessible survey.

Although, a number of recent studies indicate that anti-Semitism is marginal and on the decline in Canada, many Jews are still worried. The author writes: "Some 70 to 80 percent of Toronto's Jews, according to one scholar, still view anti-Semitism as a 'potential danger,' and have 'a sense of foreboding and pessimistic assessment' of the potential for future anti-Semitism in North America."

A 1984 scholarly survey of the social geography of anti-Semitism found "surprisingly warm feelings towards Jews on the part of Canadians," 86 percent of whom held positive or neutral opinions. In this survey, anti-Semitism was found to be highest in Newfoundland, New Brunswick and Quebec, and lowest in Alberta.

"Not surprisingly, social class was found to be an even more important determinant of anti-Semitic attitudes than religion or francophone background, and the study found that irrespective of religion, the lower one descends in the socio-economic hierarchy... the more anti-Semitism one finds."

What troubles many Jews, is the government's inability or unwillingness to deal effectively with Nazi war criminals, the continuing fulminations of such cranks as Ernst Zundel and his ilk, and manifestations of anti-Jewish feelings among some ethnic groups and a portion of the black community.

Growing intermarriage and the question of continuity agitate Jewish leaders, at the same time that the day school movement has a larger percentage attending these schools in Toronto than in any other North American city.

This book brings to life the colorful and exciting saga of a creative and determined people over 75 years in Canada.

With Timbrels and Dance

I climbed the hill
at first shyly, gingerly, furtively surveying stony boulders, true to my Polish self who like the fearful Yemenite Jew must not ride a donkey or climb heights,
but walk in invisible submission obedient to the law of the land.

Then
transcending geography of pain's implacable memory,
I took an upward plunge toward freedom, and with a neophyte's zeal
let my feverish feet dance on every stone and promontory with timbrels parting the Red Sea.

On good days
my soul caresses the blue-green cliffs of forest's pinnacles, and filling the blue edge of misty Sinai,
we both tremble with freedom.

they will move the park to Montreal if they can't buy the 31 hectares (77 acres) of land on the Downsview site. The federal government will only give them a 99-year lease.

Abraham Reichmann, 36, said recently the final site has yet to be chosen.

North York Spadina Councillor Howard Moscoe, who represents the neighbourhoods near the Technodome site, said it's "most unlikely" the project will move to Montreal. "It's blustering," he said, adding that "the only thing that will scupper the deal is if the Reichmanns can't get the financing."

David Sadowsky, executive director of CLC Downsview Inc., the Crown corporation responsible for the Downsview site, said no sale to Heathmount was ever contemplated.

He said revenue from the Technodome lease, as well as from the sale of lands south of Wilson to Costco for a big-box plaza, will be used to finance the $100 million needed to maintain the entire Downsview site and build a promised 140-hectare (350-acre) park.

Construction is scheduled to begin on the Technodome in September and to be completed "sometime in 2002," according to Heathmount vice-president of operations Rubin Dubiansky.

Heathmount estimates 11 million people will visit the park annually, and that the project will generate 17,000 construction jobs and 17,000 permanent jobs once completed.

The two million-square-foot facility will have an indoor mountain for year-round skiing, a waterpark with kayaking, a rain forest, an amusement park with rides, movie studios, 3-D cinemas and a 12,500 seat arena.

Last August, Friends of the Downsview Lands appealed to the OMB against an amendment to the city's official plan which was passed by council last summer. The amendment rezoned the entire 534-hectare (1,320-acre) site of the former Downsview base for parkland, housing, a high tech industrial park and Technodome.

A hearing date has not been set.

The appeal says the amendment contains "inadequate measures to safeguard adjacent neighbourhoods from traffic infiltration and parking."

City planners estimate that 80 percent of Technodome visitors will come by car.

With 40,000 potential visitors expected on any given Saturday, 32,000 people could come to the site by car in one day, said Vince Lombardi of the Downsview Lands Community Voice Association, another residents' group which is not part of the appeal.

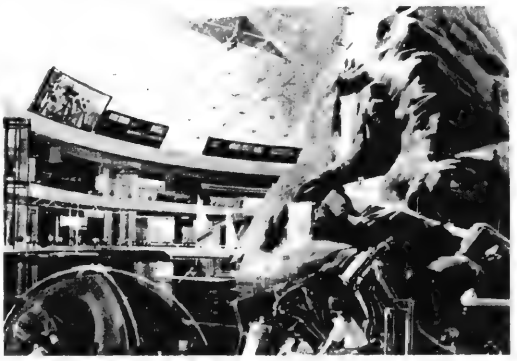
He said that with Technodome, Yorkdale and a new big-box plaza on Wilson Ave., all within a 1-square-mile radius of each other, there will be "too much congestion" on weekends and holidays.

Birnbaum said his group's appeal also cites concerns about the lack of community input into the planning process. "The issue is about plunking down an enormous development alongside an existing, stable community, which is likely to have a large effect on it, with a minimum of public involvement and discussion."

Consultation with local residents over the past two years through a community advisory panel was inadequate, Birnbaum said, since the panel was appointed by the old North York city council and panel members were not necessarily responsible to the community.

"Nobody knew about [the advisory panel]. If most people don't know about it, it's clear it didn't work properly."

However, speaking for Heathmount, Dubiansky said local residents have been adequately consulted.



Sports World, part of the proposed Destination: Technodome.

Heathmount also has an interest in minimizing traffic and parking problems, he said. "As a business it's important for people to be able to get to our door quickly and easily and have a place to park. So we have a business interest in all of this, aside from taking community interests into account."

Birnbaum said his group also intends to appeal the detailed agreement between Heathmount and the city, which will iron out details of the Technodome development.

The agreement will be based on amendments to the project imposed by city council in December, which included reducing the overall size of the 13-storey building by 10 per cent, eliminating three ice rinks and adding 2000 more parking spaces. As well, Heathmount will have to pay the fares of visitors coming to Technodome by TTC.

Once finalized, the agreement must be passed by city council before it can be appealed to the OMB. Birnbaum wants both appeals to be heard together to save time and money and because issues for both appeals would overlap.

OMB to hear appeal of Technodome agreement

Rob Dolan, acting director of community planning for the north district, said city planners would defend plans for the Downsview lands at the OMB.

But an agreement on details is on hold as the city waits to hear from Heathmount. Dolan said there have been no discussions with Heathmount since the city wrote the developer in early March asking how it plans to incorporate the changes passed by council in December. The developer has yet to respond in writing, he said.

"I'm quite confident that [the project] is going to proceed as council originally dealt with it, but it's in [Heathmount's] court now," Dolan said.

Dubiansky said the delay is not related to the threatened move to Montreal, but has mainly to do with incorporating the December changes.

Moscoe says an appeal to the OMB would have a "marginal" chance of success.

"The general rule of the OMB is that they will not overturn the decision of a council – a democratically elected council – unless there was a grievous error in planning or an error in law," Moscoe said. At worst Technodome represents "an error in judgment," he said.

Moscoe said that he "would rather [Technodome] be in Montreal," but won't support the appeal, since he voted for Technodome at council. But he said the appeal has his "full moral support."

'Not necessarily' a done deal

He said Lastman had the votes for the Technodome "stacked since the beginning," so Moscoe said that instead of opposing it, he "tried to structure the project so that it will have the least impact on the community."

Birnbaum said Technodome is "not necessarily" a done deal, since Heathmount can't start building until all outstanding legal issues are settled. He said if the OMB appeal is not successful, his group may take the federal government to court to force a full environmental assessment for the entire Downsview site.

"A done deal is when building actually starts. And even then it's not a done deal....There's lots of things that can be done to slow things down."

But Dubiansky said no matter what the obstacles, "the project is not going to go away. It's a great business. It's great for the city. It's great for the local community."

Young Judaea's shaliach boosts youth trips to Israel

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Since Ryan Hass arrived here as Canadian Young Judaea (CYJ) shaliach in fall 1996, the Zionist youth movement has more than doubled the number of youngsters participating in its Israel experience programs, making it the largest Israel program high school group in Canada.

In 1997, 85 students representing a variety of Jewish backgrounds took part in the programs. This year, almost 190 are registered thus far, surpassing the goal of 150 students set by CYJ last year.

"It's hard work, but it's very fulfilling," said Hass, who devotes an estimated 70 percent of his time to Israel programs. "For a long time, the community has realized the Israel experience has so many significant ways to enhance one's Jewish identity."

Last year, UJA Federation established a subsidy fund for high school students participating in Israel experience programs. This year, the Bronfman Foundation, United Jewish Appeal and United Israel Appeal joined forces to provide subsidies of $2,000 per student for Israel-based university programs, on a first-come first-served basis.

Hass attributes increased interest in CYJ Israel programs in part to a Toronto ad campaign.

But the best advertising, he believes, is by word of mouth. To that end, CYJ Israel program alumni from Vancouver to Halifax have been involved in an outreach program, speaking to their peers about their experience.

Hass himself has travelled to a number of cities – as near as Hamilton and as far away as Vancouver – to speak with potential Israel program participants.

Stephanie Tuchmayer, 17, a student at Westmount Collegiate Institute who took part in Camp Biluim Israel last summer, has been helping promote CYJ programs here.

Her six-week trip increased her awareness about Judaism and Israel's background and cultural mix, she said. She also gained leadership experience, learning new skills by running programs along with other students.

The Biluim Israel program is the culmination of the CYJ summer camp system, which has seven camps across Canada. The organization also offers half a dozen other Israel programs, all including pre- and post-programming.

CYJ's newest program, Hagshama, has a volunteer component and is its only program geared for post-high school students.

Hass – who as a young teen went on an Israel program run by CYJ's sister movement in England – feels the outreach effort is worthwhile even if he only has the opportunity to talk to a couple of teenagers, and even if they end up choosing an Israel program run by a different organization.

"[It's for] such a good cause," Hass said, "because you know how positive the experience is."

Weinrib busy with two projects rather than an academic job on the side."

Weinrib, who works out of a somewhat cluttered office near the planetarium, is currently busy with two projects.

In addition to writing a monograph about the charter, she is planning a book about its influence on South Africa and Israel.

An ardent observer of the Israeli legal scene, Weinrib has been closely watching the topical battle which pits Israel's activist Supreme Court against the Orthodox establishment. In this increasingly bitter showdown, the tensions between Israel's dual identity as a Jewish homeland and a secular democracy flare up with acrimonious regularity.

Lectures widely on human rights

Weinrib can't quite fathom the intensity of the haredim's reactions to recent Supreme Court decisions. "Some of them have been straight applications of statutes passed by the Knesset. So the outrage should be levelled at the Knesset, not the court."

In other instances, she noted, the Supreme Court determined that government policies were inconsistent with "basic democratic functioning."

Weinrib, who lectures widely on human rights, is following the proceedings of Israel's Supreme Court on another front. The court, for the first time, has decided to render a decision as to whether the Shin Bet security service is on firm legal ground when it resorts to torture during the interrogation of Palestinian terrorist suspects.

In her opinion, the burden of this controversial question should not fall solely on the court, but should be resolved jointly by the Executive, the Knesset and the Supreme Court.

Langer leads by example

During her first year as President of Jewish Women's Federation, Janice Langer has tackled some very tough issues, including women abuse and the ongoing controversy surrounding the Jewish get. But this veteran UJA Federation volunteer says her long term community involvement is also about setting examples for future generations to follow.

"My community work helps me fulfill my responsibility to my fellow Jews," explains Langer, who has held volunteer positions with Jewish Women's Federation, Jewish Family and Child Service, Kehilla Residental Housing Project and Canadian Society for the Weizmann Institute of Science. Langer was also a board member of the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto and Associated Hebrew Schools where she served as President of the Parents Association. "I remember how my parents sacrificed so that I could attend Hebrew school and that makes me want to give something back."

Looking back on the past year, Langer is most proud of JWF's highly successful Women Abuse program, which attracted over 400 people and featured acclaimed Rabbi Abraham Twerski. "It was a giant step forward in raising awareness about the issue as well as letting women who are victims of abuse know that they are not alone," notes Langer. As part of JWF's advocacy efforts, Langer also organized an unprecedented meeting between Twerski and 20 local orthodox rabbis to discuss the issue of women abuse in Toronto's Jewish community. "I called many of the rabbis personally because their participation was very important to me."

Among other 1998-99 highlights: the growing success of JWF's Simcha Basket Project, the Shalom Toronto greeting program, the ongoing Healthy Living Learning Series, which JWF co-sponsors with Mount Sinai Hospital and Langer's participation in the General Assembly of The Council of Jewish Federations in Israel last fall. "Above all I learned what a great job JWF is doing here at home."

JWF says it's about time

Being a wife, mother of three, full-time legal consultant and a part-time volunteer is a constant juggling act for Lori Disenhouse. But help is on the way for her and other women on-the-go thanks to an upcoming time management seminar being sponsored by Jewish Women's Federation.

"I would be grateful for any advice on how to manage my commitments with less stress and less guilt," says Disenhouse, whose busy schedule often leaves her feeling torn. In addition to her job, Disenhouse is a member of two school boards and JWF. She is also a participant in the Wexner Heritage Foundation program, devoting four hours a week to study. "Sometimes I feel like I've taken on too much," Disenhouse confesses.

"Many women find it hard to cope with being pulled in different directions," notes Ingrid Kay, who along with Disenhouse, is co-chairing JWF's Balancing Your Act. The program, co-sponsored by UJA Federation Women's Campaign, is on April 26, 7:00 p.m. – 9:00 p.m., at the Lipa Green Building, 4600 Bathurst Street.

Stress Management expert Jerome Shore says his four step program will offer participants strategies to alleviate daily stress, allocate time more effectively and teach women how to make time for themselves. "Most women forget about personal time because they don't see themselves as a priority," says Shore.

"JWF recognizes that women are increasingly taking on multiple roles and responsibilities and that's why we feel it's important to offer these kinds of valuable programs," notes Renee Schachter, Vice President of JWF's Social and Political Action portfolio.

"If we are to maintain a strong core of community volunteers, we must be sensitive to the unique circumstances many women find themselves in and try to accommodate them," she adds.

JWF's second spring program, co-sponsored by UJA Federation Women's Campaign, "Women and Financial Awareness," Tuesday May 18, will feature a panel of experts covering a wide range of financial issues relating to women.

For information about these upcoming programs, call (416) 635-2883 ext. 135. Space is limited.

Aid sought for Kosovo refugees

The refugees were living outdoors as best they could, in rain, mud and cold, just as so many Kosovar Albanians are, Frieberg recalls.

Frieberg herself was deported in March 1940. "The effects of that never leave you. You suddenly find yourself belonging nowhere and lining up for a piece of bread. I see those people [Kosovar Albanians] being so confused. That's exactly how we felt."

Jews, especially Holocaust survivors, she feels, have a special obligation to help, given the haunting similarities in language being used today – of men being taken outside and mowed down by machine-gun fire, of people being rounded up and told to get out.

"I've been there," Frieberg says. "I know their pain. It never leaves you. It's for life."

Across Canada, Jewish communities are being asked to respond to the tragedy. Donations may be sent to:

• Canadian Jewish Congress Charities Committee (Kosovo Relief), 1590 Avenue Docteur Penfield, Montreal, Quebec, H3G 1C5. Phone 1-514-931-7531. Following the Passover holidays, Congress was returning dozens of calls.

• Money and clothing may be sent to the Humanitarian Relief Fund of B'nai Brith Canada, 15 Hove St., Toronto, M3R 4Y8. Phone 1-800-892-2624.

• The UJA Federation network has established Kosovo relief funds across Canada at every local federation. In Toronto, cheques can be made out to UJA Kosovo Relief Fund, 4600 Bathurst Street, Toronto, M2R 3V2. Credit card donations are being accepted by calling 416-631-5705.

Jews have "a moral and historic obligation to assist in any way we can," said Toronto UJA Federation president Joseph Steiner.

The money will be forwarded to the Jewish Agency for Israel (funded by UJA campaigns around the world), which is shipping 43 tonnes of supplies, including tents, sleeping bags, blankets, baby food and milk to Albania.

The supplies and nearly $200,000 (Cdn) were donated by Israelis through the Spirit of Israel drive. A rock concert in Tel Aviv's Rabin Square raised approximately $750,000 (Cdn).

The government of Israel is also sending a field hospital to the region.

The Toronto-based Ve'ahavta – the Canadian Jewish Humanitarian & Relief Committee is also collecting funds, to be distributed to the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee, (JDC).

Donations may be mailed to Ve'ahavta, Kosovo Relief Fund, 20 Eglinton Ave. W., suite 901, Toronto, M4R 1K8. Credit card donations may be made by calling 416-487-5472.

Executive director Avrum Rosensweig says Ve'ahavta is also exploring the possibility of sending a medical relief mission to Kosovo, similar to the teams of Jewish health professionals it has sent in the past to Guyana and Zimbabwe.

The Toronto Board of Rabbis was scheduled to meet this past Monday, and the issue of Kosovo was likely to be raised, said board president Rabbi Philip Scheim.

Other agencies are on alert should refugees be airlifted to Canada.

"If we are called upon, we will help any way we can," said Jack Kugelmass, executive director of Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS) of Toronto. JIAS stands ready to provide help for those dealing with the psychological and emotional consequences resulting from upheaval, violence and conflict, added Kugelmass, who has spoken with key local agencies, which have also offered assistance.

According to on-the-scene emissaries from the Jewish Agency, Yugoslavian Jews are fleeing war-ravaged regions in larger numbers. Since the Kosovo crisis began, at least eight buses of Yugoslavian Jews have reached safe haven in Budapest.

Another 45 took an Agency-sponsored pilot trip to Israel to explore the possibility of aliyah. An estimated 100 more are expected. The Jews leaving Yugoslavia are predominantly between 18 and 40 years old and over a third are under 18.

Latest reports say Israel is also airlifting 100 Muslim Kosovars to the country. They will get six months asylum in Israel. Muslim Arabs in Galilee have raised about $15,000 (Cdn) for refugee relief.

In Kosovo itself, 15 Jews who have remained behind were said to be making preparations to leave, but their fate was not known as of last Friday.

One Jewish Kosovar family moved to Israel before Passover and attended a seder at Prime Minister Netanyahu's residence.

The war's impact has spread to Skopje, Macedonia, where 132 Jews are preparing to settle temporarily in nearby Bulgaria, hosted by the Jewish community of Sofia.

Bombs are reported to have exploded close to the Yugoslavian Jewish community in Belgrade. However, Jewish residents are apparently safe and food supplies are adequate.

Question: I have a child with special needs which will be ongoing. What should I be doing to be certain this child would be cared for even after I'm gone. Signed S.F.

Answer: Dear S.F.: As financial planners this problem is not brought to our attention as often as it should be. Most of the time we learn of this special need situation somewhere in the middle of another process with our clients, but once the special situation becomes known we commence a program of planning not only for the lifetime of the parent but also for the lifetime of the child.

The planning for the special needs child has two components. The first part of the process is developing the plan for the parents which works during their lifetime and after they have passed away. This involves proper wills, executors, trusts and trustees, etc. The second part of the process is the provision of the necessary funding to carry out the plan. This obviously requires the preparation of a detailed investment plan and utilizing quality investment advice.

Any plan is only as good as the implementation. We recommend that you obtain the services of a qualified financial planner who will help you through the entire process.

Question: I'm not pleased with the income I receive from my G.I.C. because interest rates are low and my tax rate is high. Is there a safe alternative? Signed M.E.

Answer: Dear M.E.: We are often asked this question and the answer is "yes". The INSURED ANNUITY is the combination of a life annuity and term life insurance. The internal yield of the annuity is about the same as a five-year G.I.C., however only a portion of the annuity income is taxable. In a recent case proposed to a 75-year-old client, based on a $50,000.00 investment, the annuity provided an annual income of $6,502.00 of which only $1,554.00 was taxable. After the payment of tax and the life insurance premium, the client had disposable income of $2,912.00. When compared to the G.I.C. disposable after tax income of $1,667.00, the client was clearly ahead with the insured annuity. You might think of the insured annuity as a G.I.C. for life. It is interesting to note that the G.I.C. rate required to match the disposable income of the insured annuity would have to be 13.5%.

Messianic group gets new listing

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – A local messianic group previously listed under "Synagogues" in the Yellow Pages will in its 1999 edition be categorized under, "Synagogues – Messianic," according to Bell ActiMedia, the directory's publisher.

But that compromise has failed to satisfy the leadership at Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region (CJC-Q).

"My first reaction is one of disappointment," CJC-Q chair Dorothy Zalcman Howard said in an interview.

"I'm disappointed because part of our complaint was related to the fact that messianic groups represent themselves as being part of the Jewish religion," an impression that could remain even under the revised listing, she said.

"These are evangelical Christians masquerading as Jews. I suppose it's an improvement, but it doesn't address our main concern that they are misrepresenting who they are."

Mike Poirier, assistant manager of the Yellow Pages' headings department, sent a letter on March 23 to CJC-Q saying that it had conducted research on Kehilat She'ar Yashuv, the messianic group involved in the dispute, by consulting with academics in religious studies and examining similar listings across North America.

"We determined that the most equitable solution is the establishment of a new heading titled Synagogues – Messianic," he wrote.

"This new heading identifies a clear distinction from traditional synagogues while still allowing messianic organizations to identify themselves to their members.

"We realize that this is a very sensitive issue for the Jewish community and have given careful consideration to our decision.

"This compromise should allay fears that the public is being intentionally misled by our advertisers, without sacrificing the completeness and ease-of-use for which Bell ActiMedia directories are known."

The controversy of how messianic groups are listed in the Yellow Pages dates back about six months, when CJC-Q complained about how the She'ar Yashuv congregation was listed in editions of the Yellow Pages published in Montreal and St. Laurent-Cartierville.

A similar incident involving a messianic group took place in Ottawa.

The pages were then published by Tele-Direct, which last November gave assurances to CJC-Q that messianic groups would no longer be placed under the heading of Synagogues.

Based in St. Laurent, She'ar Yashuv has operated out of a Salvation Army depot in Dollard des Ormeaux for six years. The congregation has maintained that it has the right to be listed under Synagogues, since its members see themselves as Jews who believe in the divinity of Jesus Christ.

The Jewish community, on the other hand, accuses messianic congregations of using deception to convert Jews to Christianity.

In its 1998 annual audit of anti-Semitic activity in Canada, B'nai Brith Canada spoke of the increased activity of messianic groups in Canada as, "one of the more alarming trends."

Scene in Ottawa

By G.K. SIMCOE

They call it the "Pizza Parliament." Five parties reflecting five very different regions of the country. Periodically, over the next couple of months, we will peek behind the secretive party caucus doors. Hopefully, what we see, will help interpret events as they unfold in the coming year.

We begin this occasional series with a two-part examination of the governing Liberal party. Looking at the government side of the House, the pizza analogy could be applied in describing the national caucus.

Although most of the caucus comes from Ontario, seldom could one observe a more fractured group. They rally around the Liberal flag, but few sing the Liberal mantra in the same key. Some caucus members are so "off-tune," their colleagues have called for them to "get the boot" from the national caucus.

Take Roger Gallaway or Albina Guarnieri (aka, G & G), as two cases in point. Gallaway, a chain-smoking, teddy-bear type, introduced a private member's bill on negative billing. He wants to prevent companies from gouging consumers by billing them for services not explicitly ordered. He argues that companies like our cable providers know most customers will passively accept the new billing rates. A genuinely 'liberal' idea, n'est-ce pas? Yet the government has employed every tactic to quash Gallaway's effort.

For her part, the endearing and soft-spoken Guarnieri has desperately been trying to pass another private member's bill to require consecutive (as opposed to concurrent) sentences for convicted killers and rapists who commit multiple offences. Yet another traditional Liberal notion. Well, in the week before the Easter recess, it was Guarnieri's bill that got killed, triggering bitter recriminations within the Liberal caucus.

Scores of other Liberal backbenchers are resentful and despair about playing any kind of meaningful role in Parliament. They complain that committee work is pointless since the cabinet overrules any proposals or amendments that challenge the original legislation tabled by the government.

They point to G & G as evidence of the futility of taking on personal initiatives. And, they have abandoned the dream of any backbencher...to make it into Cabinet. For the Prime Minister and his Cabinet colleagues, this represents a recipe for disaster. Next week, we will look at how Chrétien et al plan to reduce the heat of the stew that's moving from simmer to steam!

Hatzoloh responds to Orthodox medical needs

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL— After more than two years of operation and responding to about 2,000 calls, the Orthodox community's emergency medical service is still unable to obtain official recognition from the Quebec government. The government refuses to explain why.

Zev Neuwirth, director of the Hatzoloh Rescue Squad, believes that if it had the same authority as Urgences Santé, the sole ambulance service in Montreal, it would be able to more efficiently care for the Orthodox community, and perhaps save more lives.

Without this recognition, Hatzoloh, an all-volunteer, non-profit organization, is not allowed to use lights and sirens that can cut the time it takes to get to the scene, often by critical minutes, said Neuwirth.

The government's stamp would also give Hatzoloh the authority to work in greater harmony with Urgences Santé, and be integrated into the emergency care system, he said. At present, Hatzoloh walks a fine line with Urgences Santé, which welcomes its assistance in overcoming cultural barriers, but is concerned people may be putting themselves at risk if they call Hatzoloh first.

Hatzoloh initially presented its case to Health Minister Jean Rochon last year, but received nothing more than an acknowledgment of receipt, he said. "With the new health minister [Pauline Marois], we're back to square one."

As it stands, Hatzoloh has little more status than "a neighbor helping a neighbor," Neuwirth said.

Hatzoloh did have lights and sirens until July 1997, but the permit was not renewed by the Société de l'Assurance Automobile du Quebec. According to Neuwirth, the loss of the permit had a discernible effect on Hatzoloh's response average, raising it from 2.4 minutes to close to three. (Hatzoloh does not transport patients to hospital.)

Neuwirth was told by the local office of the Société de l'Assurance Automobile du Quebec that the original permit had been erroneously issued to Hatzoloh. He was led to believe that the required recommendation from Urgences Santé to authorize an ambulance permit had not been forthcoming.

Neuwirth has tried to impress upon the government that Hatzoloh provides an essential service to the chassidic and observant communities in Outremont, Cote des Neiges and Snowdon.

That's not simply because Chassidim feel more comfortable interacting with those of their own community, he said. Their strict observance of Jewish law can make a life-and-death difference in how cooperative they are with medical assistance.

Official recognition denied

Although Halachah sanctions compromise when life is at stake, such as travelling on Shabbat or ingesting something on a fast day, it may be difficult to convince the observant that the situation is serious enough to warrant it, Neuwirth said.

The technicians all have rabbinical training, some even ordination, and a rabbinical advisory board oversees Hatzoloh. This reassures the community that the technicians have the knowledge to make a halachic judgment.

Hatzoloh is also particularly important for women who avoid contact with strange men, and for Holocaust survivors who often have a reflexive fear of strangers in uniforms, he said. In addition, all the technicians speak Yiddish, the language many are most at home with, and revert to in a crisis.

Hatzoloh (which means lifesaver) was founded in Williamsburg, a chassidic district in Brooklyn, in the1960s, and today is an integral part of New York's emergency care system with over 800 paramedics and 70 ambulances. Hatzoloh also operates in London, Melbourne, Johannesburg and Jerusalem, and has just started in Toronto.

In Montreal, Hatzoloh has about 40 emergency medical technicians (paramedics are not recognized in Quebec), who have an average of 350 hours of training in pre-hospital care and certification by New York state, and seven rotating dispatchers.

The technicians are on call 24-hours-à-day, seven days a week, 365 days a year. There's no charge for the service.

Hatzoloh's medical director (also volunteer) is Dr. Alex Guttman, an emergency room physician at the Jewish General Hospital.

These men respond to all calls, leaving whatever they are doing: be it working, praying in synagogue, sleeping at home, to rush to the scene in their own cars. Their average response time is under three minutes, said Neuwirth, because they live and work in their territory and know well the people they serve. "These are our relatives, friends and neighbors," he said.

Neuwirth considers it a slow day if he gets two or three calls.

Its response is a lot faster than Urgences Santé's claimed average in that area of 9.5 to 10 minutes. Neuwirth claims, moreover, that Hatzoloh's technicians have equivalent medical training to Urgences Santé's and carry similar resuscitative equipment, including oxygen, defibrillators and suctions, as well as basic first aid.

Because paramedics are not recognized, Hatzoloh, like Urgences Santé, cannot, for example, administer drugs, start an IV or intubate a patient.

To date, they've handled everything from heart attacks to car accidents to chokings. They've delivered a baby on the street, intercepted an attempted suicide and, on many occasions, simply provided reassurance when problems turn out not to warrant going to hospital.

Neuwirth, who is in the export business and the father of two, stressed that Hatzoloh does not want to replace Urgences Santé, but rather to complement it. Hatzoloh is not seeking the right to transport patients to hospital.

Canadian Jews, Palestinians buy bus

TORONTO — In a joint project intended to place people above politics, Canadian Jews and Palestinians have combined forces to acquire a much-needed bus for a Palestinian community in the West Bank.

The bus, to be purchased with funds raised by the Canadian Friends of Peace Now and Palestine House, is scheduled to be presented April 15 to the Charitable Society of Sebastieh, located about 40 kilometres from Jerusalem.

The bus will be used to transport children to day care and on educational trips. It will also take the elderly and disabled Palestinians to the local community centre and clinic.

The bus will also be filled with a variety of gifts – everything from Lego sets to prosthetic devices – donated by Toronto Jews and Palestinians.

The Peace Bus project is spearheaded by Robert Eisenberg of Canadian Friends of Peace Now and Rashad Saleh, director of Palestine House in Toronto. Peace Now says that humanitarian initiatives involving the two groups can move forward despite snags in the peace process.

"Peace Now and Palestine House together worked on this project for many months, and demonstrated that co-operation is possible," said Eisenberg. "Often, the Diaspora is more xenophobic than the homeland. But we have tried to promote peace, not fuel hatred."

Said Saleh: "We hope that this project will inspire morally and financially to get involved in other projects."

Saleh and Eisenberg, accompanied by members of Peace Now, were slated to pick up the bus in Ramallah and drive it to Sebastieh for a ceremony Thursday afternoon.

Winnipeg teenager a Bible contest champ

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Alissa Kaplan, a 15-year-old Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate student, is one of four Canadian high school students participating in the International Bible Contest in Jerusalem.

Originally from Moscow, Kaplan and her family came to Winnipeg nine years ago. She consistently wins a place on the honor role at school for her 90-plus academic average. She is an active member of Or Hagolah, the local National Conference of Synagogue Youth chapter here, and she is a member of the Ruach Dancers, the Sarah Sommer Chai Folk Ensemble's junior troupe.

She first entered the Bible contest three years ago. Last year, she did well enough to compete in Ottawa at the Canadian championships.

"I thought that participating in the Bible contest would be a good learning experience," says Kaplan, who hopes to become a doctor one day. "I wanted to learn more Tanach. I also thought that it would be a good way to meet new people."

Kaplan left for Israel on April 4. She was going to visit relatives there before the competition, which began April 11. She expects to be competing against at least 50 other teens. The other Canadians are from Montreal and Toronto.

Ottawa shuls join Agunah centres network

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

OTTAWA — Congregation Machzikei Hadas in Ottawa and Beth Shalom West in Nepean are the only Canadian institutions among over a dozen North American synagogues to join a brand-new network of Agunah Help Centres.

The centres were the initiative of New York-based Marilyn Mattie Klein, who also came up with the idea of Agunah Get Days to facilitate the Jewish divorce process for recalcitrant husbands.

Last year Klein formed L'Maan B'nos Yisroel International, an Orthodox organization serving all segments of the Jewish community, to help women trapped in marriage by husbands refusing to give them a get.

"This is something we all have an obligation to do," said Rabbi Reuven Bulka, spiritual leader of Machzikei Hadas.

His congregation was one of the first to rule that membership be denied to anyone not co-operative in the get process.

Similarly, at Beth Shalom West, recalcitrant husbands are denied membership, honors and recognition as part of a minyan, said Rabbi Howard Finkelstein, whose wife Rifka also serves as a resource person for agunot.

Rabbis Bulka and Finkelstein belong to the advisory board of L'Maan B'nos Yisrael, and have worked with Klein in helping agunot here.

She is at a loss to find words that best describe the two colleagues. "Use any superlatives," she instructs in a phone interview.

Nothing tangible has changed at the two synagogues now that they are identified as Agunah Help Centres.

Although Machzikei Hadas and Beth Shalom West are the only two Canadian shuls to bear the new designation, it would be wrong to conclude that other centres are not active or concerned, said Rabbi Bulka.

Rabbi Finkelstein believes the agunah problem is less extensive in Canada than in the United States. "I think the Canadian get law has been helpful," he said, referring to the 1990 amendment to Canada's Divorce Act to ensure that spouses remove barriers to religious remarriage before a civil divorce is granted.

Under Jewish law, a woman cannot remarry without a get. Should she remarry civilly without a get, children of the subsequent marriage are considered mamzerim (illegitimate) and may only marry another mamzer or convert.

"We don't know what future generations of babies are prevented from being born, and we don't know the value of those souls," said Klein.

Of more immediate concern to some agunot are needs like shoes for their children. "I have women who don't have food on their tables," said Klein, herself happily married for 25 years.

Agunot whose material needs are met, may not have a place to go for Shabbat or yom tov, or their children may need a surrogate father, she added.

Other problems include frustration, anger and a sense of helplessness on the part of agunot, said Rabbi Bulka.

Agunah Help Centres are in a position to help agunot meet such needs within their own community, as well as to help facilitate the get process.

The centres came about after the organization received many requests for help from outside the New York area.

"What [the Agunah Help Centres have] done is to identify rabbis, rebbitzens, communities and shuls that are 'agunah friendly,'" Klein said. "It makes women feel less vulnerable. It's making a very powerful statement."

JCS, JVS co-sponsor mentoring program

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Sandy Benayon, a 20-year-old Jewish Studies major at the University of Toronto, has always been interested in pursuing a career as a teacher. Now, as one of the first students to participate in a new career mentoring program, she's gaining an understanding of what it means to work in a high school classroom.

The program, called Career Connections, is co-sponsored by Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto (JCS) and Jewish Vocational Services (JVS) to connect third and fourth year Jewish students and recent graduates with Jewish professionals.

"I definitely wanted to get to know people in the field," said Benayon, whose mentor is Rabbi Igael Minerbi, Jewish Studies principal at Ulpanat Orot.

Before Rabbi Minerbi agreed to participate – a minimum commitment of one hour a month for six months – he met with Benayon, an alumna of the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto. Benayon is applying to the master of education program at the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education for next year.

"I saw that she is very serious," Rabbi Minerbi said. "She wants to be an educator, and I think [this type of program] is very important," he said.

When Benayon applied to the mentoring program, she specified that she would like in-classroom experience at the high school level at a Jewish day school. At Ulpana, she spends two mornings a week in the classroom, after which she and Rabbi Minerbi discuss what she has learned.

"I realize I like the high school environment in terms of the quality and sophisticated education you can give," she said. "I'm certain I want to teach in a high school environment."

Connects students, recent grads

She would advise other interested students to be assertive in terms of what they want to get out of the mentoring program.

JVS has fielded almost three dozen inquiries about the program, said career counsellor Barbara Fish.

"We are just at the beginning of putting the matches together," she said.

Areas of interest indicated by students include scientific journalism, environmental studies, politics, international policy development, dietetics, mechanical engineering, computer networking, gerontology and the pharmaceutical industry.

"It's certainly been a worthwhile experience," said Benayon.

UWO's JSU seeking Jewish students

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

LONDON, Ont. — Arye Berk, director of the Jewish Students' Union at the University of Western Ontario, is seeking Canadian Jewish university students wherever they may be.

"We will not pester the students once we have their names," he promised in a recent e-mail. His intention is to pass on student names to the appropriate Hillel or Jewish student organization.

"We will send them a letter asking if they would like to join our groups, if we can help them with any Jewish issues on campus, [or] if they would just like to meet and hang around with other Jewish university students."

Thus far he has passed on at least 70 names, including that of one student in Amsterdam.

"There's no national [campus] structure in Canada to go ahead and do this," said Berk, explaining his reasons for undertaking the project.

Besides, he added, he's a "computer geek" and enjoys spending the time on-line.

To contact Berk, e-mail him at ljfjsu@info.london.on.ca.

מלכת יופי ערבייה:

אחרי אלפיים שנה, נבחרה בישראל מלכת יופי ערבייה, נערה שגדלה בעוני בחיפה, שבזמנה הפנוי מתנדבת לעבוד עם ילדים במצוקה. מעניין כמה מלכות יופי יהודיות עבדו אי פעם עם נוער במצוקה. לפני מספר חודשים היא השתתפה במופע דוגמנות בחסות שר הבטחון, והתנאי להשתתפותה היה ששמה והרקע הערבי שלה לא יצוין. היא אומרת שהזילה הרבה דמעות על כך, "אבל מה יכולתי לעשות, אני צריכה את העבודה הזו". כל כך מזכיר את היהודים בגולה. כל כך מיותר וטפשי. היא מאמינה בדו קיום ומדגישה את העובדה שבישראל חיים מאות אלפי ערבים, שלמרות הזדהותם עם אחיהם הפלשתינאים, מעריכים את האפשרויות העצומות שמעניקה להם המדינה המודרנית שבה הם חיים. אני מרגיש נאווה אמיתית שישראל של 1999 יכולה לבחור אזרחית ערבית בגלל כישוריה.

יהודה רוטנר מגיב על "חורף99" :

לפני כחודש כתבתי שהקופה הציבורית בישראל נשדדת על ידי הדתיים. דברי הרגיזו את יהודה רוטנר, והרי תגובתו:

"זה מרגיז. קופה נשדדת ע"י דתיים. זה גם אני. מדוע? לא צריך להכליל ! האם רק דתיים? למה סלקציות??? נידי, אינני מבין? להכפיש קהל? גם אני בוגר צבא ומלחמות (התשה ויוה"כ). גם אני בוגר ישיבה ליטאית. זה חורה, מרגיז אך מדוע לכנות בשמות דתיים. רק הם?! כל היתר צדיקים?! וכאילו רק הם שודדים לאור היום!!! ישראל בשבילנו (כאן בגלות) צריכה להיות צפור הנפש בכל.. שמירה על השם בכל המובנים. זה כואב לראות ולשמוע. אבל כך זה, ואין צורך להביא דיבת הארץ רעה... נידי, אתה בחור אינטליגנטי דיו כדי להביא כתבות יותר אופטימיות..

מאחד שאכפת לו (קורא שרוף של מאמריך) אבל... שישאר בינינו

אני חולק על דעתך לגבי "הוצאת דיבת הארץ". אני כותב טור בעברית לישראלים. הישראלים הם אנשים פתוחים שמעונינים בדיון פתוח על ישראל. אני מתראיין פעמים רבות כל שנה באנגלית על ישראל, וכמובן שֵׁשׁ הדיון שונה ואינו נכנס לעניינים שבמשפחה. לגבי בקשתך לכתבות אופטימיות יותר- הינה לראייה' מתוך שלוש הכתבות, אחת עסקה בספרו הנפלא של עמוס עוז, אחת הגיבה על התקפת הכורדים על ישראל (נושא שאינו שנוי במחלוקת בין ישראלים ויהודים), ורק אחת היתה "פסימית" כדבריך. לעומק העניין: כתבות אופטימיות בצורה לא מציאותית על ישראל (כפי שמופיעות הרבה פעמים בעיתונות היהודית) מיועדות לקהל שונה, שחולם על ישראל בלתי מציאותית. לישראלי שחי בצפון אמריקה (שהוא קהל היעד של הטור שלי) יש ציפיות אחרות. ואכן-רוב הביקורת על "שישאר בינינו" מגיעות מיהודים קנדיים קוראי עברית ש"הזדעזעו" מעניין זה או אחר. שיזדעזעו. סך הכל לא צריך לקרוא בעיתון כל מילה. ואם זה מזעזע, אפשר לקרוא בבוקר ולא לפני השינה. ואם מתעקשים לקרוא לפני השינה - אפשר לקחת חצי ואליום.

U.S. envoy critical of Israel's Russia policy

By DAVID MAKOVSKY
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — In a meeting with Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu here last weekend, Martin Indyk, U.S. assistant secretary of state for Near East affairs, was highly critical of Foreign Minister Ariel Sharon's new Russian policy.

Indyk indicated that he did not believe Sharon was acting on his own with the new policy.

In his criticism, Indyk quoted from an interview in the New York Times in which Sharon said that he was trying to win support from Israeli voters of Russian origin. Indyk also expressed dismay that Sharon has not thrown his weight behind U.S. efforts in Yugoslavia.

But Sharon, in Moscow for meetings with political leaders and interviews with the Russian media, told Channel One in a phone interview this week that he is "in full agreement" with the United States when it comes to Russia.

Stressing that he was not changing Israel's orientation away from the west, he added that Israel needed a "more balanced policy" toward Russia than it has had.

Sharon's aides deny that the foreign minister had planned to send a message to Syrian President Hafez al-Assad, who was due to begin a visit to the Russian capital yesterday. Assad suddenly decided not to go.

There was intense speculation that Sharon wanted to capitalize on being in Moscow at the same time as the Syrian leader, which was coincidental, to ask Assad to lower tensions in south Lebanon, and to tell the Syrian leader – through Russian intermediaries – that after the elections a government headed by Netanyahu would be ready to negotiate in earnest with the Syrians.

Sharon's mission to Russia came up in his meeting last week with U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright, who expressed concern that Sharon had not coordinated his new policies regarding Russia, with the United States.

Those new policies include a "carrot and stick" approach to Moscow in an effort to win Russian cooperation in halting the transfer of technological military know-how to Iran.

Participants in the meeting at the prime minister's office say Indyk was critical of Sharon's lack of unambiguous support for NATO action in Kosovo, including the foreign minister's refusal to explicitly condemn Serbia.

In his interview with Channel One, Sharon refused to back the NATO attack; instead, he called for the United States and NATO "to stop the fighting and bring the parties to the negotiating table."

Participants said Indyk pointed out to Netanyahu that since Russia vehemently opposes U.S action in Yugoslavia, now is not the time for Israel to ally itself closer with Russia.

Moreover, U.S. officials say they are not reassured by reports that Sharon is seeking a deal for commercial satellite launches on Russian rockets, at the very time Israel expects Washington to restrict Russian commercial launches on U.S. rockets.

The United States has so far restricted Russian commercial launches as a way to extract cooperation in stopping the leakage of nuclear and missile technology to Iran.

According to participants, Indyk noted that Netanyahu's statements regarding U.S. action in Serbia were more in tune with Washington's expectations, but Indyk added that it was difficult to believe that Sharon was acting without Netanyahu's support.

Britain convicts war criminal

By DOUGLAS DAVIS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LONDON – British Jewish leaders are hailing the two life sentences given a man convicted of murdering 18 Jews while serving in a Nazi-allied police unit in Belarus during World War II.

After a two-month trial in Britain's first war crimes prosecution, Anthony Sawoniuk, a 78-year-old retired British railroad ticket collector, was convicted last week on two separate charges: murdering two Jewish men and a woman; and shooting 15 women with a sub-machine-gun after ordering them to strip and face an open grave.

Sawoniuk settled into a life of domestic anonymity here in 1946 after fleeing with the retreating German soldiers from his home in the Belarus village of Domachevo. He was also implicated, though not charged, with the murders of several children and an infant, as well as for his role in a 1942 Yom Kippur massacre.

Lord Janner of Braunstone, chairman of the Holocaust Educational Trust, said he was "very glad that this murderer has received a fair trial and that justice was both done and seen to be done.

"The Nazis gave neither trial nor justice to their victims," he said.

"I am sorry that so many other war criminals who sadly found refuge in Britain have so far escaped justice."

But he added: "The trial is a symbolic beacon, relighting memories of the hideous barbarity of the past."

The trial followed extensive investigations by a team of police and historians that was set up after the landmark War Crimes Act was passed in 1991.

The law, which provoked a wave of controversy among senior members of the legal community because it was enacted after the crimes were committed, gave British courts jurisdiction over non-Britons for crimes against non-Britons on non-British soil under Nazi occupation.

The investigation has cost a total of $18 million and although one other case is still under investigation, it is considered highly unlikely that further trials will be held.

Lord Janner, who helped steer the War Crimes Act through Parliament, defended the expense.

"We don't count the cost of murder trials – it is a question of justice," he said.

Thousands of men from eastern and central Europe were allowed to enter Britain virtually unscreened in the immediate aftermath of the war in order to ease a critical labor shortage.

Many, like Sawoniuk, are now believed to have used this opportunity to escape from their hometowns and villages after perpetrating war crimes.

The eight-year investigation of war criminals in Britain has involved 376 suspects. Of those, 117 were dead. And in 257 additional cases, investigations were dropped either because of insufficient evidence or because the suspects were too old and too ill to be questioned and prosecuted.

France considers requesting extradition

By DOV ALFON
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

PARIS — France is considering asking the United States to extradite John Demjanjuk, sources in the French legal world told Ha'aretz last week.

Demjanjuk, suspected of being the notorious guard, Ivan the Terrible, at the Treblinka death camp, was tried for war crimes in Israel in 1993 but exonerated due to insufficient evidence.

The day after his release, an action was filed against Demjanjuk in France by French attorney Arno Klarsfeld, who represents an association of children whose parents perished in the Holocaust.

In the action, Klarsfeld, who is the son of Nazi hunter Serge Klarsfeld, charged that Demjanjuk was proven during the Jerusalem trial to have served as a guard at the Sobibor death camp from March 27, 1943, to Sept. 30, 1943. Despite the Jerusalem court's findings, he claimed, Demjanjuk could still be indicted for crimes against humanity.

According to Nazi records, French Jews were packed into four trains and sent from Paris to Sobibor during the time Demjanjuk was a guard there.

Those records offer the basis for a legal claim against the French government and for France's right to request that the United States extradite the former guard, the action stated.

The effort to revive the case against Demjanjuk gained steam after a document that suggests Demjanjuk was connected with Maidanek, another death camp, was unearthed in government archives in Latvia in 1995.

The association then amended its pending action to include the new information.

Meanwhile, the French daily newspaper Le Monde, reported that escaped Nazi war criminal Alois Brunner, Adolf Eichmann's deputy, is to be tried in Paris in absentia.

The paper said the trial was the result of French authorities' increasing impatience with Syria's unresponsiveness to extradition requests.

Brunner is considered responsible for planning the extermination of the Jews of Austria, Salonika and Slovakia, and for the systematic persecution of Jews in other countries occupied by the Nazis.

Between June 18, 1943, and the end of April 1944, Brunner is thought to have supervised the transfer of 25,000 Jews from France to Auschwitz.

Israel Election Notebook

May 17

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — One Israel leader, Ehud Barak, said last week that the elections could "be over in one round if Yitzhak Mordechai would acknowledge that he has no chance of making it to the second round." Either way, Barak expressed confidence that he would win.

Speaking to campaign staff, Barak presented a Teleseker poll showing that if Mordechai withdraws from the race before the first round and announces his support for Barak, Barak will get 53 percent of the votes, with Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu receiving only 39 percent.

If Mordechai does run, he will get 14 percent of the vote, with 35 percent going to Netanyahu and 39 percent to Barak. In a second round, according to the poll, Barak would get 49 percent and Netanyahu 44 percent, with seven percent of the voters still undecided.

• Centre party leader Yitzhak Mordechai and party member Dalia Rabin-Pelossof have decided against kicking off the party's election campaign in Jerusalem with a moment of silence at the grave of late Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, ignoring the advice of strategists who believe it would help boost the party's popularity.

Mordechai and Rabin-Pelossof, the late prime minister's daughter, decided to keep the slain leader out of the current election campaign.

The Centre party's campaign in Jerusalem began on Sunday with its main figures – Mordechai, Shahak, MK Dan Meridor and former Tel Aviv major Roni Milo – addressing supporters at the Jerusalem Theatre.

Party strategists decided that the four should campaign together after it emerged that the party was viewed as lacking a clear, united stance on major issues.

• Rabbi Uri Zohar will get a chance to revive his former skills as a comic actor and director by directing election campaign television ads for both Shas and the United Torah Judaism parties.

Zohar, who gave up a successful show business career when he became haredi several decades ago, began producing election propaganda for Shas a month ago and has now taken on work for United Torah Judaism as well.

The former actor is considered to be a follower of the Lithuanian branch of the haredi community. The branch is headed by Rabbi Eliezer Menachem Schach.

Book denies Holocaust

By RUTH E. GRUBER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

ROME — A scandal has erupted in Poland surrounding a new book whose publication represents what some see as the first serious case of Holocaust-denial in the country.

A popular professor at the University of Opole in southern Poland, Dariusz Ratajczak, was suspended from his teaching post following protests over his book, Dangerous Topics, in which he writes sympathetically about published material that denies the Holocaust.

Legislation that came into effect in January makes Holocaust denial punishable in Poland, and the state prosecutor's office has begun an investigation into the case, according to Stanislaw Krajewski, a leader of the Polish Jewish community and the American Jewish Committee's consultant on Poland.

In his book, Ratajczak appears to agree with Holocaust deniers who claim that for technical reasons it was not possible to kill millions of people in the Nazi gas chambers, that Zyklon B gas was used only for disinfecting, that there was no Nazi plan for the systematic murder of Jews and that most Holocaust scholars "are adherents of a religion of the Holocaust."

Krajewski described the book as shocking. "Until recently there was no attempt at Holocaust denial in Poland," he said. "The proximity of that tragedy and the abundance of witnesses suggested it would never occur, even among extreme anti-Semites. But finally the distance in time has produced similar consequences as the distance in space did for Westerners."

Ratajczak's book drew swift and vociferous protests from numerous sources, including Senator Wladyslaw Bartoszewski, an Auschwitz survivor himself.

Tikva born in camp

home village. She said she would wait until she was reunited with her husband before deciding on a name for the baby. But the head of the hospital, Dr. Chezi Levy, said that the newborn would be called Tikva (Hope), at least by the medical staff, as a reflection of its joy at the birth.

An hour later, Ramziha Halim, 29, another expectant mother, entered the facility. She gave birth the same evening, also to a girl.

The next day, a Macedonian official showed up at the field hospital and asked to take the two mothers and their newborns to a hospital in Albania, but without the rest of their families living in the refugee camp.

Israeli hospital staff turned down the Macedonian authorities' request because they did not want the women to be separated from their families.

The joy over the births was dampened by the death of a 56-year-old woman from Pristina, Hamida Zanila, who apparently suffered from heart trouble and high blood pressure.

On another evening, the tent ward was occupied by an unconscious elderly man. He showed symptoms of not having drunk or eaten for several days, and was so dehydrated that his life was in danger. The staff hooked him up to an intravenous line and later gave him baby food. His medical chart listed his identity only as "unidentified." When he became conscious yesterday, he said his name was Hamidi Barisha and added that he was "probably more than 75 years old."

Among the Israeli staff are two doctors of Albanian origin – Dr. Matityahu Dina and Dr. Bella Biram – who are also helping the staff communicate with the Albanian patients.

April 5

• Israeli riot police patrolled the streets of Nazareth urging residents to remain indoors. The police clampdown came after at least seven people were injured in clashes between Christian and Muslim Arabs that coincided with the Easter holiday.

(Later in the week, two shops, one owned by a Christian and the other by a Muslim, were firebombed in renewed violence.)

• Two soldiers died at an army base along the Lebanese border in a murder-suicide incident that apparently began as an argument over who had the right of way in a narrow trench during guard duty.

April 6

• Israeli planes carrying humanitarian aid, equipment for a field hospital and medical staff arrived in Macedonia and Albania to provide support for refugees streaming out of Kosovo.

• Avner Shalev, the director of the Yad Vashem Holocaust Memorial called on the world to protest ethnic cleansing by Serbs in Kosovo, but added that comparisons should not be made to the Nazi genocide of Jews.

April 7

• The IDF announced that, for the first time, it will admit women to an officer training course for combat units.

April 8

• One of three Palestinian offices in east Jerusalem ordered closed by the government will be shut down and two others will stay open, under a deal agreed with Internal Security Minister Avigdor Kahalani.

April 9

• Foreign Minister Ariel Sharon sent an emissary to meet with Russian authorities to inquire about the release of the three American servicemen held by Serb forces in Belgrade. Sharon also phoned Russian Foreign Minister Igor Ivanov, asking him to use Moscow's influence to obtain the release of the three soldiers.

Family-run Furrier Provides 'Full-service' Care

Kahnert Furs on Avenue Road is a family-run business that has been serving the Greater Metropolitan Toronto area since 1957. For many women, owning a fur coat provides them with a feeling of warmth, and comfort and the fur requires special care in order to maintain its natural characteristics.

"We have always been known as a 'full service' furrier where customers can expect professional, knowledgeable, and personal advice on restyling, alterations, cleaning and repairs," says Dan Kahnert, the 4th generation of the family business.

During the hot summer months, he stresses that cold fur storage is essential to prevent the premature drying of the pelts and to preserve the natural oils in the skin. Cedar closets and air-conditioned homes simply lack the necessary cold temperatures, the proper humidity levels, and an adequate circulation of air.

At storage time, every fur is examined by one of the family, and should any repairs need attending to, free estimates are provided. It is important to look after any small repairs early on so that further damage is avoided.

Over the course of a dirty winter, furs can accumulate dust, grime, and dirt and therefore require a professional fur cleaning. Kahnert recommends that furs should be cleaned once a year or at least every 2 years. This special cleaning process is an effective, preventative measure that will add years of beauty and life to your furs while restoring their natural lustre and silkiness.

You may also take advantage of their trade-in policy. Kahnerts will allow you up to an additional 15% off the Spring Sales prices on any new purchase when you trade in your outdated fur.

They offer a quality selection of Canada Majestic Mink, Sheared Beaver, Canadian Lynx, Sable, as well as Raccoon, Beaver, and Muskrat, in a wide range of styles, lengths, and prices.

Their selection of top quality shearling lambs and fur lined Microfibres round out their very unique and diverse product mix.

Kahnert Furs is located at 1702 Avenue Road (north of Lawrence) and can be reached at (416) 781-8472.

Health

PMS a real medical problem, says doctor

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
CJN Staff

TORONTO — Premenstrual dysphoric disorder (PMS) is a real problem, but not as common as people think, says the director of the Program in Women's Mental Health, Toronto Hospital.

Over 150 symptoms have been described by women, but to be considered PMS, symptoms must occur during most menstrual cycles, in the first week before menstruation and must get better within a few days, Dr. Gail Robinson said at a recent lecture sponsored by Holy Blossom Temple Sisterhood.

It is important for women to establish that there is a time when they are entirely symptom-free, she said, otherwise the problem may be related to something else.

Severe PMS symptoms, which occur in about two to eight percent of women. Robinson said, can include mood fluctuations, persistent anger, irritability, a decreased interest in usual activities, a change in appetite, or a sense of being overwhelmed or out of control. In essence, "it is a mini-depression that comes quickly at a particular time and goes away."

At least 50 percent of the women who think they have PMS do not, she said, "but if you think you do, it is important to chart your symptoms. Each day, you must mark your mood, and after a few months you will know if you have a typical [PMS] curve."

If women do go to a doctor with the symptoms, Robinson said, that chart must be drawn up. "If the doctor makes a diagnosis on the first visit, then it is an improper diagnosis."

Progestins, vitamin B, and diuretics, which have all been touted to help PMS, she said, do not work. "Drugs that do work are antidepressants. These drugs work naturally, so they take several weeks to work, but they do work well for PMS."

A lot of women, she said, take antidepressants during the second half of their cycle and have seen a marked improvement. "There is hope out there."

After giving birth is another time when women may suffer from psychiatric illness, said Robinson. "This is an incredibly stressful period, when women go through hormonal changes. Maternity blues hit about 50 to 70 percent of women."

About 10 to 15 percent of women, she said, suffer a major depression after giving birth. "It is important for women to be aware there is a huge possibility that they may suffer from depression after having a baby."

Treatment for postpartum depression includes support for the mother, possible hospitalization in a mother/baby unit and antidepressants. "With proper treatment, the majority of mothers recover quickly."

Contrary to what many women believe, said Robinson, menopause is not a time when women are likely to suffer from depression. "Menopause is not what people think. Most women get through it very nicely, and many feel relieved."

The vulnerable women, she said, are those who have had a previous depression or who have suffered from PMS. Many women who think they are depressed, she said, are reacting to the physical changes of menopause. They also may associate menopause with loss, and a fear of not being valuable in the community.

Robinson said that women at any stage of their lives should be encouraged to seek help if they feel depressed. "A depressed person feels hopeless, but depression does go away. It is hard to feel better, but if you stick with [treatment], it does go."

If a woman does seek medical help, and the depression persists, she should ask her doctor about the dosage of her medication, she said. "Some doctors do not prescribe proper dosages. If a woman is not feeling better, something should be done."

Women should also be aware of a doctor who constantly changes dosages. "She never gets a chance to feel better. Make sure the doctor has a good plan and goes about it in an orderly fashion."

It is essential for a doctor to check out other medication a woman may be taking, said Robinson, because depression may be a side affect of some medications.

JGH gets over $900,000 for two pilot projects

MONTREAL — The Jewish General Hospital (JGH) has received grants totalling over $900,000 from the federal government for two pilot projects deemed to be innovative in the delivery of health care.

One project, which has been granted $456,449, is designed to improve and evaluate discharge planning and followup for elderly patients in the emergency department.

A discharge co-ordinator will be hired to "facilitate and ensure rapid, efficient and safe discharge of patients on the basis of an evaluation of their health, functional status and needs."

The co-ordinator will prepare a care plan and arrange for followup, as required.

"This approach is expected to reduce the number of return visits to the emergency department, [reduce] the rate of hospitalization within two weeks of the visit to emergency, improve patient satisfaction, and ensure more effective monitoring of drug consumption," said emergency physician, Dr. Marc Afilalo.

The second project, funded with $453,676, will develop and evaluate cultural sensitivity in the delivery of mental health care.

The JGH says mental health services are under-utilized by immigrants and aboriginal peoples because of linguistic or cultural barriers.

This project is designed to improve access to these services by this population through the development of specialized consultation.

Consultants and linguistic interpreters will be trained to offer culturally appropriate services.

The grants, announced by Mount Royal MP Sheila Finestone on behalf of Health Minister Allan Rock, were provided by the Health Transition Fund. The projects were recommended by the Quebec health and social services ministry.

Holocaust movies available on video

By LARRY ANKLEWICZ
Special to The CJN

A number of people have asked me recently to recommend some good Holocaust videos. And with Holocaust Remembrance Day (Yom Hashoah) rapidly approaching, I gave this question a great deal of thought and came to the conclusion that there are a large number of such films available.

One of the early Holocaust films was The Pawnbroker, a groundbreaking film that dealt with the traumas suffered by a survivor who tried to rebuild his life in the United States. Rod Steiger gives a tremendous performance in a film of classic proportions.

The Shop on Main Street was another early masterpiece that focuses on one woman's life after her country is occupied by the Nazis. This film also gives us some idea of the greatness of Yiddish actress Ida Kaminksi, who plays the lead role in this Czech film.

A film that is frequently forgotten and difficult to find is Border Street, a Polish film produced in the late 1940s. It gives one of the earliest and best pictures of life in Poland under the Nazis. Unfortunately, this film has never been distributed in Canada. However, it is available from an American retailer called Facets, which can be reached on the internet at facets.org.

But for films which are better known and more easily accessible, I don't think any recent film has approached the emotional power and impact of Schindler's List. This film, which took in over $300 million at the box office world wide, loses none of its power on the small screen.

Another extraordinary film available on video is Europa, Europa. This European production was filmed mainly in Germany and tells the true story of a young Jew who is forced to flee his home when war breaks out in Europe. Through an unusual set of circumstances, this boy managed to serve in both the German and Russian Armies. His talent for languages and his ability to adapt, enabled him to survive to tell his incredible story.

Also moving, is the Polish-produced Korczak. This film tells the story of Janusz Korczak, the Jewish doctor who ran an orphanage in the Warsaw Ghetto and who went to the gas chambers rather than abandon his children.

An outstanding television film about the Holocaust is Playing For Time, the stark and realistic dramatization of the Fania Fenelon story. Fenelon was a musician who was part of the camp orchestra that played as people were led off to the gas chambers in Auschwitz.

The only drawback to Playing For Time is Vanessa Redgrave's performance in the lead role. But if you can get past that, the video will leave an indelible mark on your conscience.

Another excellent film is Triumph of the Spirit. This is also a true story and is about a young man who before the war was a boxing champion in Greece. The film follows him through his struggle to survive the death camps. Only his boxing skills, which he was forced to use for the amusement of the Nazis, allowed him to survive the War. He later made a new life for himself in Israel.

A strong romantic interest drives the film War and Love. This true story opens in Warsaw just before the beginning of the War. A young teenage boy falls in love with a young girl who has just moved into the neighborhood.

The two youngsters are separated by the war but they manage to find each other and their love helps them survive the Warsaw Ghetto and the concentration camps. After the War the young man won't rest until he is reunited with his true love.

Au Revoir Les Enfants tells the story of several Jewish children hidden in a Catholic boarding school in France during the occupation of that country.

The Assisi Underground shows how church officials and the ordinary people of the town of Assisi saved several hundred Jews during the German occupation of Italy.

Also of interest is The Murderers Among Us, the personal story of Simon Wiesenthal, who after the war became the well-known Nazi hunter.

The Boat Is Full is a Swiss-made film detailing the inequitable treatment accorded Jewish refugees who managed to escape into Switzerland during the War.

Hannah's War is the story of Israeli poet Hannah Senesh, who parachuted into Nazi-occupied Europe in an attempt to make contact with the Jewish communities there. She was captured, tortured and eventually executed, but she has become a genuine heroine in Israel.

Her poem, Eli Eli, was set to music by an Israeli composer after the war and has become almost an anthem of the Holocaust in Jewish communities around the world.

There are also a number of very good documentaries available, including the 9½-hour Shoah. Basically, Shoah is a series of interviews with survivors, perpetrators and witnesses of the Holocaust. Its simplicity and lack of pretension provides Shoah with a power beyond that of most films on this topic.

And we must not forget several television miniseries that first brought wide-scale media attention to the whole topic of the Holocaust.

QB VII tells the story of an American author who writes a best-seller about the Holocaust and accuses a British doctor of being a war criminal. The doctor sues the writer and the court case sheds light on many of the atrocities committed during the Holocaust. Ben Gazzarra and Anthony Hopkins are superb in the lead roles.

Holocaust was of questionable quality, spreading itself very thin in trying to expose the wide breadth of the Holocaust. But it was also the miniseries that brought the Holocaust out of the closet and to the full attention of the western world. It was also the first time many of us witnessed the work of such superior actors as Meryl Streep, James Woods, Tovah Feldshuh, and many others.

And finally we have War and Remembrance, a 12-part miniseries that incorporates some of the most harrowing concentration camp scenes ever put on film. The effect is chilling.

These are only some of the Holocaust films presently available on video. But viewing even some of these videos will serve as a useful and educational experience and these videos will also serve to keep the memory of the Holocaust alive for many generations to come.

Mammy! Jolson's back

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — He had to scour New York to find an antique victrola which would play it, but Mike Burstyn finally heard his father sing Sonny Boy (Zundele Mein) in Yiddish.

It was recorded in 1927 in the years when Pesach'ke Burstyn, a star of Yiddish theatre, used to follow Al Jolson into the recording studios in New York, using the same orchestras and arrangements, to do Jolson's famous songs in Yiddish.

In Toronto for the opening of Jolson: The Musical at the Princess of Wales Theatre (April 20 to May 2), Burstyn recalled for The CJN the first time he heard "Jolie" sing on a 10-inch 78 at the age of 10.

"I've been a fan of his ever since," said Burstyn, a superstar in his own right and a part-time resident of Israel, where he won an Israeli "Oscar" for his part in The Two Kuni Lemils, a film in which, incidentally, he got a small part for his father, who died in 1986.

His mother, the former Lilian Lux, also a star of Yiddish theatre, still lives in New York's east side, where Burstyn grew up on Second Avenue.

Burstyn said he spends as much time as he can in Israel, where his son lives. He hosted and performed with Danny Kaye on a month-long

Designer inspired by Lloyd Wright and Art Deco

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Bonita Silver fell under the spell of architect Frank Lloyd Wright and his Art Deco influence in her teens, when her Kitchener school art class visited a home in Upstate New York designed by the late 20th century icon. That was 25 years ago.

Later, when choosing a career, Silver looked first to practicality, and earned a degree in secretarial administration at Ryerson. But she never forgot her mentor and the elegant, yet clean lines of Art Deco. She created and produced her own works emanating from his style.

Now, Silver has taken the plunge and opened Bonita's Dimensions Inc., a design centre featuring her original concepts in the Art Deco mode. "With a pocket full of dreams," she notes, "I ventured out in search of the missing link" – the tie between personal joy in fashioning alluring design, and an appreciative public.

What she has achieved, is a series of fine, yet functional interior design applications for commercial and residential use, as well as giftware, advertising and logos appealing to the discriminating consumer.

A handsomely illustrated catalogue details the products – carpets, wallpaper, glassware, porcelain and stone tiles, office accessories and patterns on wood.

The designs are all-Canadian, all Silver. Carpets are manufactured in Ontario, glass and tile are superior quality from European markets.

All of the work is customized and an accomplished carver will translate certain concepts into stone, if desired.

Paris-based Roche Bobois franchises are displaying Silver's glassware in their Montreal, Miami, Houston, Washington and Mexican locations. She also expects to place her distinctive pieces in the Toronto area. You can view her work at www.bonitasdimensioninc.com.

Burstyn brings Jolson to life

tour of army bases and hospitals following the Six Day War.

"I don't do an imitation of Jolson; I bring him back to life as he was," said Burstyn, who sings 18 of Al Jolson's songs in this new production of the musical, including Sonny Boy, California Here I Come, Toot Tootsie Goodbye, April Showers, My Mammy, Swanee, Baby Face, and Give My Regards to Brodway.

Burstyn has appeared in Toronto many times for fundraising events but particularly remembers his leading role in The Megillah at Ontario Place in 1969.

One of the reasons he looks up to Jolson, he said, is that the singer "was the first superstar to appear on Broadway and proudly say he was Jewish."

On the road with Jolson: The Musical since last October, Burstyn said he is glad that whole families enjoy the show, even though the children have never heard of the entertainer and don't know his songs.

He is also conscious of the magic charm that Jolson's songs have for adults who identify with the music, which has more meaning for them than musicals like Rent and Stomp.

Mike Burstyn and co. resurrect Al Jolson.

He is pleased that his mother has finally arranged an English language edition, through Syracuse University, of his father's autobiography originally published in Yiddish in Israel.

Built along the same compact lines as the singer, and the same height (5 foot 7), Burstyn enters into Jolson's role with gusto. And wouldn't you know it? His favorite song in the show is Sonny Boy.

TRAVEL TALK

BY BILL GLADSTONE

FOOD FIT FOR A KING

When the Egyptian-Jewish Mosseri family opened the King David Hotel in Jerusalem in 1931, the supreme holy city was a provincial backwater lacking even a single fine restaurant worth its salt. Spiritual capital of three great faiths, Jerusalem offered tremendous succor for the soul but only paltry nourishment for the stomach.

The Mosseris paid $150,000 to the Greek Orthodox Church for the 4½-acre site upon which they built the King David. It was designed as a first-class hotel from the start. The lobbies and public rooms were conceived in a grand neo-Egyptian style, with Assyrian, Hittite, Phoenician and Greek-Syrian motifs subtly gracing the pillars and moldings. A few art deco flourishes were superbly integrated into the whole, a tasteful nod to the contemporary.

The hotel's service was as regal as its decor. The bellboys and pages wore olive-green jackets and gold-braided vests over white shirts and baggy Turkish pants. The waiters, tall black Berbers from north Africa, wore white robes and gloves, red fezzes, and broad red sashes from shoulder to waist.

And the food? No suitable chef could be enticed to make aliyah to Jerusalem, so the King David's meals were shipped by train from Cairo each night, arriving fresh at the train station the following morning. Probably only a few guests ever realized the extraordinary lengths to which the hotel routinely extended itself to insure their perfect room service orders.

Rebuilt in all its former grandeur after the 1946 bombing, today's King David still goes to considerable lengths to provide top-quality gourmet cuisine to its guests. As witness La Regence, the smallish, intimate, European-style restaurant that is just downstairs from the main lobby.

Tuxedoed waiters escort guests to their tables, each table adorned with a tiny corsage of red roses. The room is decked out regally in dark panelled wood and rich red brocades. From a dark corner by the kitchen, sophisticated piano music softly emanates. The lighting is also soft.

It's motza'ei Shabbat, and La Regence has opened up for the Saturday evening traffic, not nearly as heavy here as in Tel Aviv. Still, several tables are filled – as is the air – with lively conversation in several languages: Hebrew, English, French, Russian. Except for the Hebrew, we might be dining in any one of a handful of European capitals.

But something else distinguishes La Regence from comparable establishments in Europe or North America: everything on the menu is kosher and non-dairy — including the the Goose Liver Pate, the Oxtail Consomme, the Chicken Barbanconne, the Gnocchi au Pistou and the Mallard Duck in Mango Sauce. If you're yearning a cheese omelette or pasta alfredo, head for the strictly dairy (and considerably less expensive) King David Garden Restaurant upstairs.

Though the menu boasts "continental" (read "European") as opposed to regional fare, the La Regence wine list, not surprisingly, heavily favors Israeli labels, with Carmel and Golan being the best represented.

I start with La Regence Salad, an artfully designed plate of greens in a vinaigrette sauce. The Clear Fish Soup arrives in stages: first the bowl, then the soup, which the waiter ladles from an imperial silver chalice. It's not as clear as advertised, and looks remarkably like my mother's homemade chicken soup, with a few carrots and fish tidbits resembling pieces of knaidlach (matzah balls). It's nice and light, delicately seasoned, and not too fishy.

Regal food at regal prices

After the soup is cleared away, the waiter places a silver helmeted dish before me and raises the lid dramatically. Revealed is a juicy veal cutlet on the bone, sitting on a toasted crust and surrounded by an elegant clockface of grilled vegetables. The veal is tender, delectable and hot, although not plentiful: eight ounces, no more. The plate bears the initials KD under a crown, reinforcing the perception that this is a dish worthy of a king.

At the appropriate moment the waiter wheels over a dessert tray laden with chocolate mousse, blueberry fruit tarts, lemon pies, a fruit salad and other temptations. Next comes coffee and tea, and finally the bill. For meals and wine for two people, expect to pay about 300 to 400 NIS ($75 to $100 US) and more. Who said dining like royalty would be cheap?

La Regence, in the King David Hotel. Supervised by the Rabbinic Authority of Israel. 23 King David Street, Jerusalem 94101. Tel: (972) 2 620-8888.

Families, friends remembered at AIDS seder

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
CJN Staff

TORONTO — Gilda, Lisa and Philip Berger attend the third seder, a Passover celebration for those affected by HIV and AIDS every year.

The three siblings used to go to this seder, which is sponsored by Holy Blossom Temple AIDS committee, with their late cousin, David Steinberg. "He was very ill. We came with pillows so he could rest his head," Gilda and Lisa recalled.

"When people saw how ill David was, they gave him a special reading. He wept his way through. He wept through Bashanah Haba'ah. He was so uplifted."

Now the Bergers come back to the seder to remember their cousin, they said. "We find ourselves being drawn here," Gilda said. "People said to us, 'Please don't stop coming because David has died. Please support the living.'"

Like the Bergers, many participants at the seder attend year after to year to memorialize family and friends who have died of AIDS, Jennifer Baldachin, chair of the third seder told The CJN. She said, the families and friends say: "Passover isn't complete without coming here."

The annual seder, held at Holy Blossom, draws some 300 people a year, Baldachin said. She noted that a special Haggadah, adapted for people affected or infected by HIV and AIDS, was revised this year. The ceremony also included live music with Baldachin on the flute, Alan Gotlib on guitar, and vocalist Honey Novick.

The seder was led by AIDS activists Louise Binder, chair emeritus of Voices of Positive Women and co-chair of the Canadian Treatment and Advocates Council, and Ron Rosenes, honorary director of the AIDS Committee of Toronto.

Rosenes described the seder as an "incredibly affirming" evening.

"There's no getting away from the fact that the people with HIV are still marginal and stigmatized," he said. "An evening like this goes a long way in creating understanding and awareness."

Binder noted that first seders were smaller gatherings at a downtown community centre. "I've seen it grow into this really incredible gathering."

The seder is the brainchild of Donna Keystone, a physician specializing in the treatment of AIDS, and a member of Holy Blossom.

Looking at the size and success of the event, she said she felt "like a proud parent."

She said she started the AIDS committee at Holy Blossom and the first seder in 1991, because she felt the community "needed a Jewish response to AIDS."

The purpose of the temple committee was "to reach out to the HIV community...to make them feel... they had a place they could come and be part of a family," she explained. "I really think we created that."

Harvey and Ruth Preseman, whose son Jeff died of AIDS in 1995, said they attend the third seder every year to support Holy Blossom because the AIDS committee has given them tremendous support over the years.

"Holy Blossom has a special place in our hearts," Ruth said. "It was very welcoming. It gave us a chance to meet other people [in similar situations]. It was a place for people like us to come to.

"It's very meaningful that we continue on to educate people about HIV and AIDS... This a wonderful venue to raise people's consciousness."

Carolyn Bennett, a physician and the MP for St. Paul, said she "has always been impressed with the Jewish community's ability to understand people who are estranged. Inclusivity is part of the core values."

Tracey Starr, chair of the Holy Blossom Aids committee, noted that the seder is one of several annual events which also includes the annual AIDS walk and joint education programs with several synagogues, among them Adath Israel, Beth Tzedec, and Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Israel.

BBYO WEEKEND HOOPLA

Members of B'nai B'rith Youth Organization's (BBYO) Greater Toronto Area Council hosted fellow BBYOers from Montreal and Ottawa for a recent weekend convention. Highlights included an Oneg Shabbat and the annual 12-hour Dance-a-Thon that enables BBYO to send teens to international summer programs.

Tough guy bumps and grinds

Stern fills important role with San Jose Sharks

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For a guy who built his career on in-your-face hockey and dropping his gloves at a moment's notice, Ron Stern sounds pretty thoughtful – almost professorial – when it comes to the question of fighting in the NHL.

"Fighting remains an important part of the game, but we've done a good job of controlling it so it's not embarrassing to the league," the San Jose Sharks resident tough guy said after a recent practice.

Shades of Gary Bettman! Has Ron McLean taken over the league? Next thing you know, Don Cherry will be telling you how much heart and soul those Swedish players bring to the game.

But wait. The world hasn't stopped spinning on its axis. Just to let you know the Ron Stern who waxes philosophical in the dressing room is not the same guy who laces on his Tacks at game time. Stern reverted to form later that same night.

In the middle of a late-season Sharks' encounter with the Leafs in Toronto, Stern had a run-in deep in the Maple Leafs end with the Buds resident enforcer, Tie Domi. After a cross-check (let's not say who was the first to deliver the Koho crunch), the two doe-see-doed around the ice while tugging on each other's jersey, trying to exchange punches. The fight ended abruptly when Stern's jaw stopped a Domi uppercut.

Unfazed and apparently unhurt, the two headed to the penalty box. Later Stern continued his high tempo banging and crashing to help San Jose defeat the Leafs.

To be fair, the rest of Stern's soliloquy on fighting was not so out of character. "Fighting keeps people honest," he said. "If they took fighting away, I'd have a problem with it, though it wouldn't affect me that much."

After 12 years in the league, the former Vancouver Canucks and Calgary Flames tough guy has established his toughness credentials and broadened his c.v. to include hustle, two-way play, grit and hard work. Fighting is only one element in the skill set he brings to the table.

In 72 games with the Sharks, Stern has connected for seven goals and nine assists for 16 points. He is plus-three and has two game-winning goals to his credit. He also hasn't forgotten what kept him in the NHL, as his 152 minutes in the penalty box attest.

Playing on a line with centre Mike Ricci, Stern knows his job isn't to score goals. That he'll leave up to Owen Nolan, Jeff Friesen and Vincent Damphousse, the latter acquired from Montreal at the trade deadline.

"My job is to bump, grind, wear down the opposition and bring energy to the team," he said.

It wasn't always so. Back in his junior days with Longueuil of the Quebec Major Junior Hockey League, Stern was a scorer. He used his size (6 feet, 195 pounds) to crash the net and bang in goals. In 1987, he captained Longueuil to the Memorial Cup championship.

Ron Stern

He was drafted by the Canucks, but it wasn't until he was traded to the Flames that his game really improved.

"Coaches Dave King and Mike Murphy worked with me a lot," he said, "as did Paul Baxter, who also combined toughness with NHL abilities during his playing days.

"I had a lot of encouragement to better my game," Stern said.

Like other players eyeing an NHL career, Stern was willing to do practically anything to make it in the big league. "I think I got molded into the style," he said. "When my talent couldn't keep up any more, I had to find a role to compete and to stay in the NHL. Usually, I fought a lot."

He still plays a high-energy, devil-may-care style of hockey. Even his off-ice pursuits are in the same vein. He enjoys bungee jumping and would like to sky dive one day, after his career is over.

A whirling dervish on the ice, Stern is the kind of player coaches love to have going into the playoffs. The Sharks signed him as a free agent in the off-season after he missed all of last year with a knee injury.

With the addition of Damphousse to the Sharks lineup, Stern is optimistic the team has added an important piece to their playoff puzzle. "Adding a skilled player makes the other players that much better," he said.

As the season wound down, San Jose held down a playoff spot – perhaps at the expense of Stern's old team, Calgary. Stern makes the rather surprising suggestion there's more pressure playing in San Jose than playing in a Canadian city like Calgary.

"For the fans and the media, the expectations have gotten greater" in San Jose after the Sharks' improvement this year and good playoff runs in the last few years. Now they want more.

One of a handful of Jewish players in the NHL (Steve Dubinsky of the Flames and Mathieu Schneider of the Rangers are the only other regulars), Stern's penchant for fighting had nothing to do with anti-Semitic remarks. He has experienced little or none of it in the pros. There was a little in junior, but he sloughed it off and attributed it to ignorance.

Last year, Stern and Dubinsky were recruited to play on the Canadian hockey team in the Maccabiah Games in Israel, but Stern declined because his wife was expecting their second child right around the same time.

"I was going if my wife had told me to go. I would've gone," he said.

"Going there would be a special treat, but going there for that reason would be a special bonus."

A resident of Calgary in the off season, Stern has interests in two restaurants there. He is also involved in a health food store and he is an avid mountain-biker in the off-season.

In San Jose, he's known for his work with children's charities.

The pitfalls of tax avoidance

By JONATHAN SHIFF

Israel's economy is driven more and more by high-tech, which is the most dynamic sector today.

Every day the papers are filled with stories about Israel's new multi-millionaires, who have cashed in their shares in start-up companies for millions of dollars, thereby enticing more young people to enter the field.

Along with the hiring of experts in all areas of science, an amazing amount of time and thought goes into structuring companies and finding the best ways to avoid paying some of those future fortunes to the government.

With personal tax rates exceeding 50 percent, and corporate taxes at 36 percent, the correct decisions at the beginning regarding legal structure can reap enormous benefits down the road.

Thus entrepreneurs consult with lawyers and accountants, who evaluate the proposed businesses, and suggest structures for the payment of the least amount of taxes.

When such structures include offshore companies and other forms of "treaty shopping," there is a fine line between tax avoidance, which is legal, and tax evasion, which is not. A recent court decision highlighted the pitfalls in this area.

The case involved Israel's largest pharmaceutical company, its CEO, and foreign investors, who are also well-known philanthropists. They invested together in a company which purchased the rights to distribute in Israel pharmaceuticals produced by foreign manufacturers.

The Israeli side handled the actual distribution. The investors funneled their money through a company based in Vaduz. This ostensibly was the body which would handle contacts with the manufacturers.

As a result of loopholes in the system, taxes were not deducted from payments to the Vaduz company, and the investors were able to recoup their investment quickly. In this way, the parties saved $18 million (US) over the years.

What emerged in court was that the Vaduz-based company was simply an empty shell. All the work, in fact, was done by the Israeli company.

Thus, the defendants were found guilty of tax fraud and sentenced to heavy fines and suspended jail sentences. The parties have appealed, and the case will be decided by the Supreme Court.

The lower court judgment, which runs some 330 pages, discusses some important issues which are relevant to entrepreneurs and to foreign investors in Israel.

First of all, there is nothing illegal about tax planning. If the Vaduz company had not been an empty shell, and had fulfilled real functions, the structure which was set up might have been a legitimate use of the various tax treaties and laws.

Secondly, the defendants did not convince the court that they were simply following their lawyer's advice. The judgment suggests that if they had presented all the facts to their lawyer and accountant and received an opinion that the structure was legal, they might have been off the hook.

As the structure was set up by their lawyer, one of Israel's top attorneys, I personally believe they were following his advice. But he testified in court that he is not an expert in tax law, and the judge did not excuse them on this regard.

Furthermore, it was apparent from the evidence that the foreign investors were only interested in participating if they could avoid the taxes. From the testimony it was clear that the tax issue was behind the whole structure, and that the defendants knew what they were doing.

Since the case is up for appeal, it is difficult to know what the final outcome will be. At the same time, there is no doubt that the Israeli legal system is modern and sophisticated enough to distinguish between legitimate tax planning and illegal activities.

While the potential savings are great, the pitfalls are real, therefore any serious investment in Israel should be treated with the same professionalism and thoroughness that would characterize similar activities in Canada or the United States.

About Life

Dear Ella,

In the scheme of life, this may seem like a trivial problem, but it has been causing me nothing but grief.

My dear friend Sandra is getting married and has asked me to be in her wedding party. The affair is not huge and has no set color scheme, as is the custom with many weddings these days.

I have a beautiful, elegant black gown I chose to wear. When Sandra heard I was wearing black to her wedding, she had a fit and told me black was for funerals not weddings. She is causing an awful problem for me.

I feel this gown is more than appropriate and I haven't got the financial means to go out and buy another dress. Do you think my black gown is inappropriate to wear under a chupah?

Black Beauty

Dear Black Beauty

It doesn't matter much what I think; however, it does matter what your friend Sandra thinks. A wedding day can be one of the most stressful days in a woman's life, as she makes sure all the things she arranged come together just so. The last thing she needs is to fight over the dress one member of her wedding party will wear.

Personally, I have been to many affairs where black and white was the color scheme, and it actually looks very elegant. I myself marched at a wedding wearing black.

Although it is customary to wear dark colors to funerals, black is also considered a color of elegance; hence the term "black tie." But all this is irrelevant if the bride to be is going to be unhappy and uncomfortable.

If you can't afford to buy a new dress, there are places that rent beautiful gowns. You can also keep your eyes open for a sale, or as a last resort, decline to be in the wedding party. However, that would be a real shame considering the relationship between you and Sandra.

You have both lost sight of the purpose of having a close friend under the chupah. It's a time to share one of the most important times in your friend's life. Don't you think what you are wearing should really be a secondary priority?

FINDING SANCTUARY IN ISRAEL

More than 100 ethnic Albanian Moslem refugees from Kosovo arrived in Israel last week on a flight chartered by the Jewish Agency. The group is being housed at the Ma'agan Michael field school. They will likely stay there for an initial period of six months.

In its efforts to help the people displaced by the crisis in Kosovo, Israel is also sending humanitarian aid. To date it has sent more than 100 tons of medical supplies, basic foods, clothes and bedding to the refugee camps in Albania and Macedonia. [Israel Sun photo]

Nazareth dispute turns nasty

By GIL SEDAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

Eight months before the start of a new Christian millennium, Israel finds itself squarely in the middle of a Christian-Muslim conflict centered on the town traditionally believed to be the city where Jesus was raised.

The conflict in Nazareth, if left unresolved, could have worldwide repercussions, not the least of which would be the cancellation of Pope John Paul II's planned trip to the Holy Land next year to take part in millennium celebrations.

As Israeli officials attempt to cope with the conflict, Christian and Muslim officials on both sides of the divide are charging that Israel is favoring the other side – which leaves the Jewish state in the unenviable position of satisfying no one.

Indeed, even after a committee of Israeli ministers appeared to side with the Nazareth Muslims, Islamic leaders there rejected the ministerial decision.

At least four million Christian pilgrims are expected to visit Israel next year to mark the new millennium, but recent events in Nazareth may well threaten those celebrations.

Because of biblical tradition, Nazareth – the biggest Arab town in Israel, with a population of 65,000 – has the image of a Christian city. But only 40 percent of its inhabitants are Christian.

The conflict erupted over a city plan to build a large plaza in time for the millennium celebrations near the Church of the Annunciation, where according to Christian tradition, the Archangel Gabriel told Mary that she was to give birth to Jesus.

Analysis

Israel caught in the middle

The town's Muslim leadership objected to the construction plan, saying it would damage the tomb of Shihab a-Din, the nephew of Saladin, the Muslim warrior who ousted the Crusaders from the Holy Land in the 12th century.

The town's Muslim residents, who have set up a protest tent at the planned construction site, want to build a mosque there.

Neither side appears ready to back down.

Islamic political leaders made the controversy their main issue when Nazareth's municipal elections were held last fall.

Islamic candidates won 10 of the 19 seats on the town council. But a Christian candidate, Ramez Jeraisi, was re-elected mayor.

Because of conflicting political agendas, the municipality has been virtually paralyzed since the elections.

Frustrated that they were unable to take control of Israel's largest Arab town, Islamic politicians stepped up their involvement in the controversy surrounding the site near the church.

Message from the Prime Minister of the State of Israel Benjamin Netanyahu to the Jewish communities of the Diaspora on the occasion of Israel's 51st Independence Day

This Independence Day, the last before the millennium year, finds Israel better prepared than ever to meet the challenges of our time.

It is difficult to recall today that less than two decades ago, our economic and political future was hostage to oil politics, and Israel was viewed as a strategic burden, a country in urgent need of help to survive.

We do, of course, still welcome support and friendship, and the bond between Diaspora Jewry and Israel is as vital as ever. But as a state we have come a long way. We are now in the forefront of the world's givers.

In recent weeks, we sent the first field hospital and planeloads of vital supplies to help the Kosovo refugees. And, in previous months and years, our rescue missions helped save many thousands in Rwanda, Ethiopia, Mexico and Armenia. Our medical team was the first to care for the victims of the terrorist bombing of the U.S. Embassy in Kenya. Now we are welcoming Kosovo refugees, the way we welcomed Vietnamese, Cambodian and Bosnian refugees in the past.

All this is but one indication of Israel's transformation. In the economic sphere, our country is poised to become one of the few which can compete with the world's giants. We possess today's most important source of wealth: scientific and technological knowledge and expertise. And through liberalization, deregulation and massive privatization, we are freeing our economy and enabling enterprise to flourish.

Our political position, too, is firmer. Our concept of security and the principle of reciprocity have become integral components of the peace process – which makes me believe more than ever that we can achieve real, lasting peace with our neighbors.

I am also certain that our neighbors, who have also suffered from long years of war and violence, will conclude that an enduring peace can be achieved only through negotiations, compromise, confidence building, education for peace and mutual respect. There is no other way to attain peaceful co-existence, security and prosperity for all of us, and for children and grandchildren.

On this Independence Day, I send you greetings from Jerusalem, Israel's eternal, undivided capital. Let this be a day on which we welcome the future with confidence, faith, fortitude and hope.

Skinheads' lawyers seek stay of charges

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Lawyers representing skinheads charged with promoting hatred against Roma (Gypsy) refugees have filed an application to throw the charges out of court.

The lawyers argue the charges should be stayed because the Crown improperly singled out the skinheads for prosecution while ignoring far more egregious comments about the Roma by former Toronto councillor Gordon Chong.

Seven skinheads were charged after they paraded in August 1997 outside the Lido Motel carrying signs such as "Honk if you hate Gypsies," and "Canada is not a trash can." They also shouted, "Gypsies out," while one demonstrator waved a swastika flag.

The defence argues that Chong's statements in council that Gypsies "pimp their wives and daughters" is even more hateful.

By charging the skinheads and ignoring Chong, the Crown is guilty of selective and discriminatory prosecution, contrary to the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. The skinheads were charged because of their political views, their status and their background, all of which are improper and discriminatory reasons, the defence contends.

The legal principle of selective prosecution is well established in the United States but has only been referred to briefly by the Ontario Court of Appeal in the Paul Magder case, a defence source stated.

Last week, the defence team of four lawyers subpoenaed Bernie Farber, executive director of the Ontario region of Canadian Jewish Congress, and Toronto Sun reporter Scot Magnish as witnesses.

Yom Hashoah V'Hagvurah

Several events in Toronto marked Yom Hashoah last week. Clockwise, from top:

At Queen's Park, 10 Holocaust survivors were honored by the government, the seventh year the event took place. Citizenship and Culture Minister Isabel Bassett and Attorney General Charles Harnick flank Rose Rubin Ziner, who holds a certificate of appreciation. The others honored were Abe Blankenstein, Freda Blankenstein, Edward Fisch, Bill Glied, Andrew Lengyel, Fanny Pillersdorf, Helen Reich, Nathan Rosenberg and Ted Schwartz.

Representing children of survivors, Eva Silverberg and her daughter Taylor light a memorial candle at Earl Bales Park in the community's annual Holocaust remembrance, attended by some 2,000 people. Reflections on the meaning of the Holocaust were delivered by members of the first, second and third generations, and interspersed with dramatic readings in English, Hebrew and Yiddish.

At Shaarei Tefillah Synagogue, Esther Schwartzbaum lit a memorial candle at the service sponsored by the Canadian Holocaust Remembrance Association.

Jewish war veterans – members of the color guard at Earl Bales Park pause for a moment of reflection.

"Unto Every Person There is a Name" – one of four remembrance services held by B'nai Brith Canada – took place at the cenotaph in front of Old City Hall, where Shura Verona read the names of Holocaust victims.

Jewish veterans seek archives in Toronto

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The role that Canadian Jewish war veterans played in the victory over Hitler and in the establishment of the State of Israel is in danger of being forgotten, members of General Wingate Branch 256 of the Royal Canadian Legion believe.

To rectify this situation, the branch wants to establish an official archives in the Lipa Green building on Bathurst Street.

On behalf of the branch, Sam Romberg, president, Sol Raibmon, first vice-president, and Al Rueben, publicity chair, have submitted designs for the proposed archives. They are still awaiting word and an appointment with the authorities concerned.

The Jewish war vets believe an archives in the building which houses major Jewish agencies should be a priority.

The thousands of students who visit the Holocaust Memorial Museum on the same floor where the archives would be located should read about the contributions made by Canadian Jews, said Rueben.

"One of the best kept secrets of World War II is that Canadian Jews enlisted in greater numbers proportionately than any other ethnic group, had more members killed, (524), and won more decorations," said Raibmon.

The Jews who served in the forces were the children of the immigrants who founded the strong Jewish community in Canada, he said.

There is an urgent need to set up the archives now, the officers believe, because so many members of the General Wingate Branch have died and the surviving ones are aging.

Volunteers from the branch continue to play an active role in the Harvey Lister Memorial Chapel at Sunnybrook Hospital, where a community seder was recently held for Canadian Jewish war veterans at the hospital.

The officers of the branch were instrumental, with the help of retired Rev. Allan Tipping and Rev. Bob Hunt, in setting up the first chapel at Sunnybrook.

Kashruth Council trying to move Levitt's case to rabbinical court

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The defendants in a lawsuit launched by Levitt's Kosher Foods Inc. of Montreal have filed a motion asking the court to allow the case to be heard by a rabbinical, rather than a civil court.

The motion was filed on behalf of Rabbi Mordechai Levin, executive director of the Kashruth Council of Toronto; Rabbi Yitzchok Kerzner, an officer of the Kashruth Council and chair of the Rabbinical Vaad Hakashruth of Toronto; and Rabbi Avrohom Lowinger, also an officer of the Kashruth Council and its chief kashruth supervisor.

In a previous interview with The CJN, Murray Brookman, owner of Levitt's, noted that the suit was brought against the individual rabbis because the Kashruth Council (COR) is not an incorporated entity and thus not subject to legal action.

An amended statement of claim filed with the General Division of the Ontario Court on Feb. 15, called for damages for libel and slander, for inducing breach of contract, for "unlawful interference with economic relations" and for conspiracy, and for a permanent injunction forbidding statements which would discredit Levitt's business or services; conspiring to injure the company's business, or interfering with its "economic relations."

The statement of claim also asks for costs.

The motion to set aside the case alleges that because the issues raised by the suit are intrinsically religious, they are not in the purview of the civil court; and that because Levitt's has accepted supervision by a kashruth certifying body (MK and Star-K), it has implicitly agreed to have "all disputes about certification resolved by Jewish law by a properly constituted Rabbinical Court."

Officials of both Levitt's and COR have said that they feel that it is inappropriate to comment on the case at this time.

The motion will be heard on June 11.

The CJN is following the story.

Leadership meet unites young Canadians, Israelis

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Over 200 young Jewish community leaders forged ties with their counterparts from Israel and across Canada at a recent Canadian Young Leadership conference.

For Peta Karabus of Vancouver, the weekend-long event, sponsored by UIA Federations Canada at the Inn on the Park/Holiday Inn Hotel, was an opportunity to "rejuvenate you and give you fresh new ideas."

The 37-year-old travel agent, originally from Cape Town, South Africa, lived in Toronto for five years until the mid-1990s.

She was involved in starting the young adult division (YAD) of Vancouver's Jewish federation a couple of years ago to bring young Jewish adults together for educational and social programs.

Lori Lerner, a 35-year-old day trader and co-chair of YAD, moved back to her native Vancouver in 1993 after a stint in Toronto.

Vancouver has none of the "Jewish ethnic feel" of Toronto, she said. "There's nothing like Bathurst Street [in Vancouver]."

Bridging wider gaps, Israelis and Canadians worked to understand each other's perspectives.

Dalia Levi of Beersheva said it was "very meaningful" for her to attend liberal Shabbat services the previous day. (Orthodox services were also held.)

Now, she said, she understands "another definition of the word Judaism, that doesn't exist in Israel."

Sivan Benesh, 25, of Gomeh (young leadership of the Galilee), hopes to work again with her Canadian counterparts. "We can't judge them and they can't judge us," the social work student said.

"We realize that to build a common base, we need to learn about each other," said Iris Shuster, 28, chair of Gomeh's Canada team.

Aviva Malka, a native of Montreal who spent five years in Israel before moving to Toronto last year, said she has "a lot of new questions."

The 24-year-old, who works for United Jewish Appeal as missions co-ordinator, found herself considering questions of peoplehood, ethics and spirituality. With a dual Israeli-Canadian perspective, she feels torn, she said.

The theme of the conference was B'Yachad – Come Together from Coast to Coast. Sessions included the Hidden History of the Jews, with Simcha Jacobovici; Israel and the Jewish People at a Crossroad: The Debate over Judaism and Pluralism in Israel and the Diaspora; a discussion on Canadian Jewish communities; author Gil Mann on Five Complaints Jews Have About Judaism; and Harnessing Your Creative Power with staff from MICA, a training and consulting firm. The latter session focused on ways of making meetings more effective.

The Israeli participants are young leaders involved in Partnership 2000, a project of UIA Federations Canada, established in the early 1990s to facilitate connections between Israeli and Canadian leadership.

The international conference was the first of its kind run by UIA here. Canadian participants represented nine communities across the country including Edmonton, Calgary, Winnipeg, Toronto, Ottawa and Montreal.

Jasper Kujavsky, a 39-year-old lawyer, was the lone participant from Burlington, Ont.

Montreal had a delegation of 30 people, the largest group from out of town. The political situation there has improved greatly, said attorney Patrick Essiminy, 28, who co-chaired the Montreal delegation with Jessica Cooperman. Among Essiminy's circle of friends, most are staying, he noted.

The Montreal Jewish community is unique, he noted, because of the francophone/anglophone mix. "My goal from the outset [has been] to work together."

Cooperman, 27, a PhD student originally from Ottawa, will leave Montreal to do an internship, but she plans to return.

The conference inspired her to collaborate and share ideas with people across the country. The speakers had a "huge impact," she said.

Yakov Feig of the Atlantic Jewish Council found it exciting to see what is being done in young adult divisions across Canada."

"I thought it was very meaningful to spend this time with my peers," said Loraine Tobia, the Halifax nurse who co-ordinated Red Cross personnel after last year's Swissair crash off the coast of Nova Scotia.

Tobia, 37, who is involved in a myriad of Jewish activities, is chair of the Association of Young Jewish Adults of Atlantic Canada."My goal is Jewish continuity and to prevent assimilation," she said, echoing some of her counterparts from Vancouver. "We do indeed [feel isolated]. Our numbers are so small."

Help us move into our new home.

The new Apotex Centre, Jewish Home for the Aged, and The Centre for Cognitive Disorders is going up.

It's going up at a tremendous pace.

The concrete shell of the building will be completed this winter. Anticipation is building. In those areas already poured, the walls of residents rooms are going up, the plumbing's going in and the wiring is being installed. Residents are looking forward to moving into a new facility that's much better equipped to meet the needs of seniors.

And, their anticipation will be rewarded. The rooms will be bigger, and all rooms will be private. Each room will have an entrance foyer and an ensuite washroom almost twice as large as in the current building.

This excellent new facility has been made possible by the generosity of our community. It's a wonderful achievement. If you have made a gift, please accept our thanks. If you haven't, please consider making a contribution to the ongoing work of one of the finest seniors' facilities anywhere.

For more information on how you can be part of completing the Apotex Centre, Jewish Home for the Aged, and the Centre for Cognitive Disorders, call Shirley Worth in the Baycrest Centre Foundation at (416) 785-2500, Ext. 2013.

The example of Wayne Gretzky

At first it seemed slightly incongruous. Canada is participating in an unprecedented military coalition against the government of Slobodan Milosevic. News updates from the war and the stark images of the human devastation wrought by the bombings and by the forced displacement of hundreds of thousands of refugees fill the airwaves, TV screens and newspapers each hour, every day.

Then, in the midst of the "war-footing" coverage of the crisis in Kosovo, came the news of Wayne Gretzky's retirement after 20 years in the NHL. From the very first moment of the rumored retirement last Thursday, the story dominated the mainstream media in Canada.

His last NHL game was officially played Sunday afternoon. And as of this writing, some hours after he unlaced his skates, the retirement remains the lead story on all the networks.

An entire country, it seems, was gripped by an outpouring of deep affection and heartfelt emotion for the 38-year-old hockey player from Brantford, Ont. But something more was at play here than "merely" a cathartic, national expression of thanks to a superb professional athlete walking away from his game.

It is a phenomenon worth examining.

First, of course, was the game itself: hockey. It is Canada's game, played by the "boys of winter," for the most part under winter conditions, the conquering of which demand characteristics and traits that have helped Canadians define themselves over a century and a half: hardiness, strength, agility, endurance and perseverance. Thus, to the extent that Gretzky excelled at "the game," he also excelled at being quintessentially Canadian, at embodying Canadianism.

Next, were the qualities he brought to the game: unmatched skill and talent, dedication to standards of excellence, constant hard work, unstinting effort, cool-under-pressure elegance and grace on the ice, a genuine humility and an obvious sense of gratitude for the 20-year opportunity to excel in the game he loved, all of them qualities that observers of life, let alone observers of the game, admired greatly.

Finally, there was the way he played the game. Gretzky always played for the team, for the collective aspirations represented by the colors and the symbols of the uniform. His superior skills were evident and shone so brightly on account of, not despite, his thoughtfulness towards his teammates. His leadership was enduring, effective and inspiring because it was the leadership of example.

Indeed, there are a number of lessons that we can learn from the leadership and the example of Wayne Gretzky.

- Set collective interest above self-interest.
- Abjure self-promotion for promotion of the "higher," common good.
- Avoid pettiness; foster magnanimity.
- Be loyal to the over-arching values and principles of the larger group, of the larger society.
- Be uncompromising in establishing and then trying to maintain standards of excellence.
- Demonstrate humility not imperiousness in the custodianship of the public's affection or trust; embrace with gratitude the opportunity and the privilege of carrying that trust.
- Meld form to substance, esthetics to function; superior skill never warrants a bullying, my-way-or-the-highway attitude towards others.
- Always work hard.
- Seek out neither ethical, procedural nor substantive short cuts.
- Extend a helping hand; do not point an accusing finger.

These "lessons" were considered by many to be the enduring hallmarks of Wayne Gretzky's leadership on the ice. In truth, we should all try to make them the measure of our comportment off the ice as well. Politicians and public figures, take notice.

Holocaust victims wanted to be remembered

On behalf of the government of Ontario, I want to take this opportunity to send greetings to you and the readers of The Canadian Jewish News as we observe Yom Hashoah – Holocaust Memorial Day.

Last fall, the government passed an Act to proclaim Holocaust Memorial Day in Ontario – a day for us all to reflect on what must be enduring lessons and memories of the Holocaust and all genocides. In the words of Elie Wiesel: "Let it be an act of remembrance, for that is what the victims wanted: to be remembered, at least to be remembered."

Yom Hashoah reminds us that we must continue to fight all forms of genocide. We must work together to ensure that one of the worst periods in world history is never repeated.

WOW group does not focus on loss

Re the article on the need for a group of senior singles. (CJN, Apr. 9)

As co-president of the WOW, group I am representing the members who were disturbed by the misinformation presented in the above article. For example, your article indicated that the WOW group "focused too much on coping with loss." Our group was formed six years ago as a social group. We never ever discuss loss. We are strictly a social group which has approximately 60 members who are all Jewish, widowed or widowers, aged 50-65.

We have monthly social functions such as pot-luck dinners, theatre nights, boat trips (in summer), miniature golfing, dinner theatre nights, Casino Rama and Niagara trips, and Sunday brunches at various restaurants, etc.

Homes are the real answer to homelessness

Re: The Scandal of Homelessness (CJN, March 31).

My mother, Lillian Freedman, was responsible for running a pilot program in Toronto to find homeless Jews. Despite the overwhelming feeling within the community that there simply could not be homeless Jews, she found them, and helped them to find shelter and in some cases permanent housing.

Ve'Ahavta's Jewish Mobile Response to the homeless is quite admirable. However, the only real cure for homelessness is not blankets, sandwiches, hot soup or bedding. As I have learned from my mother, it is finding these people homes.

Perhaps these same people could volunteer once a week – during the day – to find these people homes, so that they do not have to wait for coffee and sandwiches on the street at night.

Armenian genocide was a real event

I have read your front page story (CJN, April 9) about the possible derailment of the proposed Holocaust museum to be built in Ottawa. I am concerned by the statement that…"Armenians accuse the Turks of responsibility for the century's first genocide…" Are you suggesting by the use of the word "accuse" that there is an issue as to the occurrence of this genocide? I always thought the genocide was an undisputed fact.

Holocaust works of art deserve to live

Morton Weinfeld declares a self-imposed moratorium on all artistic works relating to the Holocaust. (CJN, Mar. 11)

It is my firm conviction that this nefarious event should be kept alive in perpetuity; for to diminish its historical importance is to allow it to fade into obscurity. It is not a coincidence that the words of Rudyard Kipling "Lest we forget" reverberate throughout the decades as a remembrance to the first and second World Wars!

If a Jewish academic will not foster the memory of the Holocaust of his people in the education of future generations, who then? In the words of Rabbi Hillel "If I will not be for me, who then? If not now, when?"

The film Life is Beautiful elucidates the point that life (not death or dying) is worth any means to maintain. It bespeaks a spirit so uplifting; for what parent would not shield their child from Hell!

Rethinking support of NATO air strikes

By HENRY SREBRNIK

We Jews abhor violence, especially when it is directed against a group targeted because of its culture, ethnicity or religion. The events of the past few months in the Kosovo region of Yugoslavia have been horrific. Serbian president Slobodan Milosevic has sent his army into the province to bring the recalcitrant ethnic Albanian Kosovar majority to heel and reassert Serbian dominance. Very understandably, the initial reflexive response for many of us, as we watch refugees streaming out of Kosovo amid cries of genocide, has been to uncritically support our participation in the NATO air strikes launched against him in retaliation.

But I think it might be wise to step back and analyze the situation from a wider historical and political perspective, in order to determine what this conflict means for us as Jews, and in particular, how it might affect the future of, not just Serbia, but all small states, including Israel.

Let me first deal with the past. I am myself the child of Holocaust survivors from Poland. We Jews pride ourselves on our sense of memory, and are grateful to those Righteous Gentiles, who helped save Jews during those terrible times. During the Nazi occupation of Yugoslavia, the Serb partisans bore the overwhelming brunt of the fighting against Hitler, and pinned down more than 30 Nazi divisions with close to one million soldiers. The Serbs were murdered by the hundreds of thousands. This was at a time when most Croats, Bosnian Muslims and Albanians were indifferent to the fate of Jews, and often themselves participated in the mass murders.

Croatia during the war was a Nazi puppet state, and engaged in mass murder of Jews, Serbs and others; the Bosnian Muslims raised SS divisions that fought on the Russian front; and the Albanians created a Greater Albania, under Italian auspices, which included Kosovo. Indeed, the Albanians "cleansed" Kosovo of Serbs. This is part of the reason they are now a majority in the province.

Readers of The CJN might want to compare a map of the Balkans in 1943, when Hitler and Mussolini ruled over Europe, to the map that may emerge after this war. They might be surprised by the similarity.

I am not suggesting that our appreciation of Serbian assistance more than half a century ago requires that we turn a blind eye to the crimes being committed today. But if we are serious about recognizing those who aided us in our hour of need – and certainly the Serbs saved more Jews than Oscar Schindler did! – we might temper our condemnation with just a tiny bit of compassion.

As for the present, many writers who have examined the growth of an aggressive fundamentalist form of Islam in the past few decades, speak of a "global intifidah" along a wide arc of the Eurasian continent, from Bosnia, Albania and Cyprus in Europe; through Chechnya, Lebanon, Egypt, Iraq and Iran in the Middle East; the Nagorno-Karabakh region between Armenia and Azerbaijan, Afghanistan and Kashmir in central Asia; all the way to Indonesia and Malaysia in southeast Asia.

Throughout this vast geopolitical region, politicized Islamic groups are battling for control of territory or imposing very strict forms of religious conformity on Muslim populations. Needless to say, the never-ending pressure on the Jewish state by the Palestinians is part of this process.

The Albanians are Muslims, and the Kosovo Liberation Army harbors in its ranks Islamic fundamentalists. (Let us recall that, in Afghanistan, the mujahadin freedom fighters of the 1980s were transformed into the Taliban of the 1990s.) Detaching Kosovo from Yugoslavia and creating a Greater Albania may not necessarily affect Israel negatively, but it certainly will not help the Jewish state.

Israel's humanitarian response to the Kosovo crisis has included setting up field hospitals for refugees in Macedonia, sending tons of medical and food aid and receiving refugees. Here we see Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and his wife Sarah at Ben-Gurion airport greeting refugees who arrived last week. [Isranet photo]

Given their cultural and religious affinities, Albanians are, understandably, more likely to support the Arab countries in any Mideast conflict.

But the outcome of the war in Kosovo may at some point adversely affect Israel in another, more serious, way. Throughout the world, there are regions and territories which are claimed by more than one ethnic group, or which are inhabited by minorities, territorially concentrated, who wish to secede, even if by force, from a sovereign state controlled by people differing from them by ethnicity, language, religion or other cultural markers: the Basque country, the Crimea, Hungarian-speaking regions of Slovakia and Romania, the Kurdish areas of the Middle East, Northern Ireland, Sri Lanka, Rwanda, Sudan, Western Sahara and numerous other regions of Africa – the list goes on and on. Even Canada is not free of secessionist feeling, as we well know.

Now that NATO has set the precedent that states may unilaterally attack a country on behalf of a group seeking to secede, what is to prevent the Russians, the Chinese, the Pakistanis, even the Iraqis, among many others, from attacking and dismembering other sovereign states on behalf of oppressed minorities, however they might be defined? Sheer military power will again become the order of the day in international affairs.

Let me suggest a potential case which would closely parallel the Kosovo situation. There is every likelihood that in the near future, a Palestinian state will emerge in the West Bank and Gaza. Adjoining the West Bank is the Galilee, a territorially compact and distinct region (like Kosovo), which now has a slight Israeli Arab majority. What would happen if these people, kith and kin to the Palestinians across the border, decided to seek autonomy, or even union with the new state, and were prepared to back their demands by violence? This would lead to an Israeli response which would very likely involve civilian deaths. CNN would show us pictures of refugees fleeing their homes. How would North Americans respond? Would some suggest bombing Tel Aviv?

Israel is a democracy, and its Arab citizens are not subject to the type of repression ethnic Albanians have suffered at the hands of Milosevic. But we must remember that ethnic groups are not inspired solely by the desire to secure greater civil and political rights; after all, in the case both of the Kosovars and the Israeli Arabs, the states they might aspire to be part of – present-day Albania and a Palestine-to-be – do not even remotely resemble liberal pluralistic states. The motivation is irredentist nationalism, the desire to free themselves of "foreign" rule and join their ethnic compatriots in an adjoining state.

I wish to be perfectly clear: Every people has the right to self-determination, and this includes the Albanians in Kosovo and the Arabs in Israel. But from the vantage point of those defending the territorial integrity of a state, they would have to be considered, as some political scientists have stated, "fifth column minorities," if they wish to secede and join compatriots in neighboring states.

And there is no sense fooling ourselves: If the Serbs lose Kosovo, the Serbian minority in that province will be "cleansed" by the Kosovo Liberation Army (KLA) just as surely as Milosevic is attempting to destroy them. A KLA victory there will result in a Greater Albania. This is the only plausible outcome. The same holds true in the Israeli case; an Arab Galilee would be absorbed by an expanding Palestinian state. These are not going to become multicultural states.

Should demography trump all other considerations? Should the fact that one group outnumbers another in one part of a country – in a "zero-sum" situation where no one is willing to compromise (such as agreeing to a partition of territory) – mean that those with the fewer numbers have no claim to a historic homeland in which they used to be a majority? A place which may include the cultural and religious sites so important to their collective sense of nationhood?

After all, had such been the reaction of the world community in 1947-48, when Jews were a minority in the Palestine Mandate, no Jewish state could have emerged. And let's be honest: Although provoked by the aggression launched by neighboring Arab countries, the enlarged Israel that emerged contained as large a Jewish majority as it did because some "ethnic cleansing" was carried out by Jews as well as Arabs.

And let us not forget that in the latest round of Balkan wars, Serbs too have also been the victims of ethnic cleansing, most recently when they were driven out of the Krajina region of Croatia, an area they had inhabited for centuries. No one in the former Yugoslavia is free of guilt. (And, for that matter, following World War II, the Soviets, Poles and Czechs "cleansed" their territories of Germans.)

Western commentators have accused the Serbs of genocide. Let us be very precise when we use that word. It refers to the planned, systematic attempt to exterminate an entire people because of an ideologically motivated desire to eliminate them from the face of the earth. War atrocities, massacres and ethnic cleansing are brutal and horrible, and may result in the loss of even millions of lives, but they are not necessarily genocidal. Millions, after all, died in World War I, but other than the Turkish treatment of the Armenians, no genocide was involved.

Millions of German civilians were killed in World War II, and Hiroshima and Nagasaki were destroyed by atomic weapons. Were these war crimes? Many people have argued in the affirmative. Still, neither amounted to genocide. And neither, so far, do the brutalities in Kosovo, nor, despite what some propagandists have claimed, the Israeli treatment of Palestinians.

Serbia, a country of some 10 million people, is now being bombed by the most powerful alliance in history, representing some 780 million people. They, in turn, are wreaking havoc in Kosovo. Hundreds of thousands of innocent civilians are caught up in the war. We should do all we can to provide humanitarian aid to all of these people, both Albanians and Serbs. But we need to use our heads as well as our hearts in determining our position when it comes to a political settlement of this conflict.

Henry Srebrnik, an associate professor of political studies at the University of Prince Edward Island, Charlottetown, P.E.I. specializes in comparative and ethnic politics.

After the (matzah) ball

Every year Passover catches us unprepared – unprepared for the clean-up, unprepared for the enormous shopping spree that ensues, unprepared for the numbers of people – and did I mention, unprepared for the seder?

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

How can we prepare for a meaningful seder experience?

This year I went on a quest for a new Haggadah and found the Rabbinical Assembly Haggadah a good combination of text and commentary.

We also had recourse to the Haggadot of the Bratslaver Rebbe, Rabbi Shlomo Riskin and Rabbi Adin Steinsaltz, as well as the sensitive introduction to the Haggadah written many years ago by Rabbi Louis Finkelstein of blessed memory.

But the one which caught my imagination was A Different Night: the Family Participation Haggadah, published by the Shalom Hartman Institute in Jerusalem. This Haggadah is not an easy one to follow linearly, but each section has commentaries, activities, and illustrations which can be selected according to the audience. Great for beginners as well as vatikim ("old seder hands").

The most striking feature of this Haggadah is the collection of illustrations representing the four children. Each illustration is in itself a revelation of how artists have viewed the characters of each child, and what, in various historical periods, our assumptions are about what is good and bad, who is simple, and what kind of person does not know how to ask.

Arthur Syzk, (Poland, 1939) pictures the wise son as a mild scholar and the wicked as a booted country squire holding a riding crop; the one who does not know how to ask is a peasant.

In contrast, Tzvi Livni (Israel, 1955) depicts the wise son as a young Zionist wearing a knitted kippah, while the wicked son stands across from the symbols of the kibbutz settlement, a tower and a fence among others, unwilling to engage in avodah – a play on the word for work and prayer.

In the Rabbinical Assembly Haggadah, one cannot detect the gender of the children nor distinguish the different characteristics of each child. Each figure is the outline of a human body in the same four colors in various configurations.

In his powerful woodcut, Jacob Steinhardt (Germany, 1923) depicts the wise son as a rabbi, his finger raised to make a point. The simple son wears a dunce cap, and the one who does not know looks vacantly out of the picture. The wicked son, the most prominent figure, wears the kaiser's helmet and a sword.

Lola (United States, 1920) pictures the wicked son as a boxer. Nota Koslowsky (United States, 1944) portrays him as a cigarette-smoking lout, with a bottle peeking out of his coat pocket.

The immigrant family of the Chicago Haggadah (1879) portrays the wicked son at the table, smoking a cigarette and leaning back in his chair as he points to his parents as if to say: "This is for you, greeners, but not for me."

And the charming depiction of the four children in the Claymation Haggadah (Israel, 1985) has the wicked son backing away from the whole thing – a safety pin piercing his ear!

David Moss (1996) portrays the children as cards, and uses books to reflect each child's attitude. The wise son (the king) wears the crown of Torah and reads a book. The wicked son is a knight and uses the book as a saddle. The simple son (the page) carries a Torah and a wine cup. He does not even carry a book; the Torah is enough for him. The one who does not know how to ask is represented as a clown (the joker) juggling three balls and using the books as a footrest.

So in the Hartman Haggadah's many illustrations, we see the undesirables of each era: the soldier, the athlete, the emancipated Jew, the hippy/punk, the secular Jew, the assimilated Jew.

Only in the Rabbinical Assembly Haggadah are we challenged to find each aspect within ourselves, so that at each time and in every place we confront our own simpleness, refusal to ask, refusal to be included.

The seder ends with the hope that the messianic era will soon begin. The Hartman Haggadah ends with Moses Maimonides' eloquent and prayerful vision of that day:

"In that era there will be neither famine nor war, neither jealousy nor strife. Blessings will be abundant, comforts within the reach of all. The one preoccupation of the whole world will be to know the Lord. Hence Jews will be very wise, they will know the things that are now concealed and will attain an understanding of their Creator to the utmost capacity of the human mind, 'For the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea.'" Amen.

Serious Jews wanted

A friend of mine recently spent Pesach with his family in the United States. My friend is a member of a Conservative synagogue but his family is generally Orthodox – some belonging to modern Orthodox synagogues and others being more ultra – Orthodox in their beliefs. (I do not like these labels. I use them here for the sake of brevity only.)

Bruce Elman in Edmonton

My friend described with great delight how wonderful the seders were. Everyone took turns reading passages from the Haggadah. (He proudly pointed out that all of the children read Hebrew fluently, although some read with Ashkenazi pronunciation.) There was lots of singing. With everyone sharing their own particular tunes, parts of the Haggadah were chanted multiple times. And the children all had commentaries that they wanted to share with rest of the people at the seder.

There were many commentaries on the Four Sons section of the Haggadah. One young girl, who attended a Bais Yaakov (an Orthodox school for girls), read a d'var Torah from a binder that was a compilation of commentaries contributed by her classmates. This particular commentary on the Four Sons had been written by the classmate with the help of her father, a rabbi.

The commentary described the four sons. Speaking of the rashah (the rebellious son), the commentary read: "The rashah is the wicked son: He is like Reform rabbis who lead other Jews astray."

Apparently, a number of the people at the seder took issue with this statement and it created quite an uncomfortable moment at the seder. The girl's parents also expressed concern about the statement. My friend was extremely upset by it. And rightly so!

First of all, the statement is a gratuitous slap in the face of all Reform Jews. Surely, if one wants to characterize the rashah as one who leads other Jews astray, then any rabbi – regardless of whether they are Reform, Conservative, Orthodox, or ultra-Orthodox – who leads other Jews astray should be likened to the rashah. Here, Reform as a modifier for rabbi, is completely unwarranted and could only be designed to degrade and demonize all Reform Jews. It is out-and-out anti-Semitism.

Who is responsible for this? Well, certainly not this lovely young child. Certainly, the classmate's father – the rabbi – who wrote it or encouraged his daughter to do so, merits serious condemnation for what he is teaching his children. We cannot deal with what he teaches his family in the confines of his home. But here, he tried to infuse his ideas into the minds of other people's children, and that is wrong.

Perhaps, he should re-read Pirkei Avot (Chapters of Our Ancestors): "Scholars (and rabbis), be cautious with your words..." because of the potential negative consequences of your statements.

The teacher and the school, however, are at fault as well. The teacher supervised the compilation of the commentaries. She should have read them. If she did not, it was negligence. If she did read them, she should have rejected this one or, if she did not feel she could reject it, she should have conducted a lesson in class on why the commentary was objectionable. Of course, there is another all too likely possibility: She might have agreed with it. This is where the school come in: It should not allow the promotion of ideas such as those expressed in the commentary. Incidentally, there is no issue of academic freedom here. This is lashon hara and is forbidden by Halachah.

Furthermore, to permit the promotion of such ideas is a violation of another important principle of Halachah: respect for Klal Yisrael. In Pirkei Avot, we are told, "All Israel has a portion in the world to come." This means ALL Jews, regardless of synagogue membership or movement affiliation. Attacking other Jews – degrading and demonizing them – is a breach of the principle that all members of Klal Yisrael are required to treat others with respect, care and compassion.

Furthermore, we should do nothing to harm Klal Yisrael. Creating divisions within the Jewish community is detrimental to the welfare of the Jewish community and all its members. Our history is replete with instances where a crack in the Jewish unity brought about the demise of the community.

Finally, we should shed these artificial and inaccurate designations – Orthodox, Reform, Conservative – before they cause our downfall. It is not important the synagogue to which one belongs or the movement with which one affiliates. What matter most, is whether one is serious about Judaism and one's Jewishness.

As Rabbi Israel Kenner, of blessed memory, former Chief rabbi of Sydney, taught: "Our problem is not different Jews; our problem is indifferent Jews." What we need are more serious Jews regardless of their synagogue affiliation!

The Kosovo/Shoah comparison

I am writing this column a few days before Yom Hashoah. What you are about to read is not based on any special expertise of mine. The only judgment I can bring to the ongoing catastrophe in Kosovo is my personal experience with the brutalities of war, having lived for 2½ years under the Hitler dictatorship, and having access to books and articles about the region.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Recently on public television, I heard a fascinating discussion about the war that teachers of various American schools had with their pupils. They ranged from age 10 upwards into the highest grades of high school. All the teachers compared the Kosovo disaster with the Holocaust, and therefore, justified American and NATO participation in the widening conflict. The pupils showed an evident familiarity with the major facts of the Shoah and grasped one basic idea: innocent people were being slaughtered merely because of their identity, and not because of any crimes or inimical acts they had committed.

There was, of course, one other parallel on which the TV did not comment: the selection process that evidently had been taking place in that unhappy country; young men separated from their families, taken aside and shot. A look at the refugee camps shows, alas, a lamentable absence of young male faces.

A quick look at the catastrophe does indeed suggest the comparison with the Shoah, but a closer look belies it. Jews were killed simply because they were Jews – which involved even babies and the oldest old, their killing had no relationship to place or time. In Nazi eyes, being Jewish was the ultimate offence.

The situation in Kosovo is, in this regard, fundamentally different. Religious and cultural elements played some role (the Serbs being primarily Greek Orthodox, and most Kosovars primarily Muslim). But in the end, it is the question of territory and not Kosovar identity as such that is at stake, and this distinguishes the Shoah from the present crisis.

In this respect, it looks as if Slobodan Milosevic's policies are bearing fruit: Kosovo's being emptied of its occupants and the prospect of everyone returning to his or her former abode, is probably next to nil. Displacements are usually uni-directional and cannot be fully reversed; and this sad truth will probably apply to the present crisis as well. Kosovo is not likely to return to its former state.

While I am writing on this subject, another question is often asked of me: What was the record of the Serbs during the Nazi period? Is it true that they treated the Jews better than their neighbors? The Encyclopedia Judaica says no. Its government and people appeared to have fully co-operated with the Nazis and surrendered a large part of the Jewish population to the death camps. It is true, however, that a surprisingly large number of Jews were able to hide during the war – obviously with members of the Serb population – and were able to re-emerge into freedom when the war came to an end.

But Albania, overwhelmingly Muslim, did protect its Jews, and that is a memory to cherish.

Arafat will not declare statehood on May 4

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

For the past few months, Yasser Arafat has been preoccupied by the allure of Palestinian statehood.

Despite his repeated pledge to proclaim a state on May 4, the day the five-year transitional period of limited Palestinian autonomy under the Oslo accords runs out, Arafat will not likely do so.

Arafat and his associates from the Palestinian Authority (PA), notably Planning Minister Nabil Shaath and Palestinian Council Speaker Ahmed Queri, have referred to May 4 as a "sacred date," and have said that they have no alternative but to proceed on schedule with the declaration.

Yet all rhetoric aside, no one seriously expects Arafat to carry out his threat. He realizes that a unilateral declaration of statehood would hardly advance the Palestinian cause and might indeed retard it.

A postponement, however, would ultimately serve Palestinian interests. This, essentially, is the unequivocal message he has received during his travels in the past several months. World leaders, ranging from U.S. President Bill Clinton to Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak, have advised Arafat to negotiate statehood with Israel.

Objectively, there are several reasons why Arafat will exercise self-restraint.

An Israeli election looms on May 17, and if Arafat makes good on his promise to the Palestinian masses to declare statehood on May 4, he will most probably push crucial swing voters to cast their ballots for his nemesis, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, who is hostile to the idea of Palestinian sovereignty.

No one, least of all Arafat, has forgotten that Netanyahu owes his extremely slim victory in the 1996 election to these fickle Israelis. And they will surely back Netanyahu once again if Arafat plays his statehood card prematurely.

Furthermore, in order not to needlessly antagonize even dovish Israelis, Arafat will do everything in his power to suppress terrorism. There have been no such incidents during the election campaign, and according to Defence Minister Moshe Arens, the PA has of late thwarted a number of planned attacks by Hamas against Israeli civilians.

No one disputes the fact that Shimon Peres, the Labor party candidate, lost the last election because of a spate of Hamas and Islamic Jihad suicide bombings which claimed the lives of more than 59 persons. Arafat, simply, cannot afford a new round of terrorism.

In weighing his options, Arafat is also keenly aware of another factor in the equation, namely Israel's threat to annex parts of the West Bank it still occupies should he opt for statehood without its consent.

Both Netanyahu and Foreign Minister Ariel Sharon have strongly suggested that Israel would resort to annexation in the event of a unilateral declaration of independence (which Israel itself proclaimed in May 1948, touching off an Arab invasion).

If Israel annexes the remaining chunks of the West Bank still under its jurisdiction – the dream of Jewish settlers and their allies on the far right – the wobbly Oslo peace process will expire and the prospect of a viable Palestinian state will irretrievably vanish from sight.

At present, the PA holds approximately one-quarter of the West Bank. Under the terms of the October 1998 Wye memorandum, which Netanyahu froze when he dissolved his government and called for new elections, the Palestinians were supposed to gain control of 40 percent of the West Bank, with the vast majority of the Palestinian population, within 12 weeks.

But if Israel seizes 60 percent or less of the West Bank, the PA will be left with a non-contiguous rump of a state, a "toy state," in Palestinian parlance.

Yasser Arafat

Since the PA is seeking, at a minimum, 90 percent of the West Bank, Arafat knows full well that a unilateral declaration of statehood will be an empty, futile gesture, one that will win him friends neither in Israel nor in the West.

In 1988, when the PLO was still in a technical state of war with Israel, the Palestine National Council in Algiers officially declared statehood. In a strictly utilitarian sense, the declaration remained a dead letter. Arafat, obviously, has no intention of revisiting this formula.

In the meantime, Arafat – one of the shrewdest political operators in the region – is using the leverage of statehood to wring support from the United States, Canada and western Europe.

In February and again last month, Arafat met with Clinton in Washington. On both occasions, Clinton urged him to refrain from endangering the peace process by declaring a state unilaterally.

At their last meeting, which took place in the White House on March 23, Arafat reportedly agreed to accede to Clinton's wishes. In exchange, Clinton is said to have assured Arafat that he would use his influence to prod Israel into fulfilling its pledge to relinquish a further 11 percent of the West Bank.

Shortly after the Wye accord was signed and sealed, Israel transferred two percent of West Bank lands to the Palestinians and permitted the PA to open an airport in the Gaza Strip. Israel made these concessions after the PA promised to crack down on terrorism.

Instead of inspiring mutual trust, the Wye agreement unravelled in a welter of accusations and counter-accusations. Netanyahu, fighting to keep his government intact and trying to appease far-right cabinet ministers opposed to Wye, accused the PA of shirking on its commitment to combat terrorism.The PA , mistrustful of Netanyahu's motives, charged Israel with breaking the letter and spirit of Wye by releasing Palestinian common criminals rather than political prisoners.

Much to Arafat's satisfaction, the Clinton administration has all but sided with the PA in the acrimonious dispute over compliance with Wye.

Last February, in a testy public debate with the Israeli embassy's deputy chief of mission, Lenny Ben-David, the U.S. assistant secretary of state for Near Eastern Affairs, Martin Indyk, disputed his claim that the PA was not complying with Wye.

Since then, Dennis Ross, a senior American official who helped broker the 1997 Hebron accord, has said that Israeli settlement expansion in the West Bank is "very destructive" to the pursuit of peace.

Eager to widen the disagreement between Israel and the United States, and anxious to ingratiate himself with the Clinton administration, Arafat will do nothing drastic to upset his budding relationship with Washington (which has already committed great sums of financial aid to the PA). Arafat, therefore, will not declare unilateral independence come May.

His strategy with respect to Canada and the European Union is similar. Working on the assumption that "we will have an independent state sooner or later," Arafat was assured last month that a delay in proclaiming statehood would eventually yield beneficial results for the Palestinians.

In Ottawa, Canadian Prime Minister Jean Chrétien bolstered the Palestinian case when he implied that the outcome of talks between Israel and the PA should be a Palestinian state.

In Berlin, the European Union passed a resolution affirming the Palestinians' "unqualified" right to self-determination, "including the option of a state."

Circumstances have forced Arafat to defer a May 4 declaration of statehood. But clearly, the Palestinians are moving inexorably closer to achieving their historic objective.

A daily mitzvah

By RABBI REUVEN TRADBURKS

The mitzvah of loving your neighbor as yourself, a mitzvah in this week's parshah, also applies to one's spouse.

In an interesting section of the Talmud, it states that one cannot marry a woman without first meeting her. Why? Because the Torah says, "Love your neighbor as yourself," and if you don't meet your wife first, you may find her objectionable, and hence violate this mitzvah.

I don't want to go into all the interesting side issues of the section of the Talmud – the issues of prearranged marriages, and the societal changes that have entirely altered our views of marriage.

However, the notion that loving your neighbor as yourself also applies to your spouse, is a great lesson. I know it's obvious, but the obvious is often neglected.

The Torah's mitzvot are concerned as much with the minute to minute behavior – language, honesty and time management – of husbands and wives, parents and children, as it is with the great moments of religious expression such as Yom Kippur and seder night.

Imagine the effort we make to fulfil the one mitzvah of telling the story of the Exodus from Egypt. We cook, we clean, we prepare, we set the table, think about how to involve the children and the guests, then spend a whole evening until late at night.

Love your neighbor as yourself

We have encountered hundreds of moments when we have the opportunity to perform interpersonal mitzvot of loving your neighbor as yourself, such as standing in line waiting for the cashier and being patient, and avoiding sarcastic and hurtful comments to wives, husbands and children. You can't fulfil the mitzvah of the seder at the expense of loving your neighbor as yourself.

Loving your neighbor as yourself is a mitzvah that we encounter literally hundreds of times a day: how we greet our husband as he walks in, how we speak to our children, how we compliment our wives for their hard work, how we smile, how we scowl, how we help out, how we use pleasant language, and how we express respect for accomplishments both professionally and in the home.

It is precisely the common and routine that present the greatest challenges when it comes to loving your neighbor. It is often easier to be pleasant, warm and friendly with business associates than with our wives, husbands or children.

While it is important to treat everyone with love, it is very easy to neglect the family, and especially one's wife, the person to whom one should show the most love.

Loving your neighbor as yourself is the great mitzvah of the Torah, because the benefits of doing it are so great, and the challenges of doing it right are so great.

A primer on Israeli elections

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

As Israelis prepare to vote on May 17, they'll be:

- sizing up hundreds of candidates for Knesset...
- choosing between 33 official political parties,
- scrutinizing five candidates for prime minister,
- and clicking through dozens of Web sites designed to steer voters through this complicated maze.

Even if you don't have a vote, you can benefit from the massive information available on the World Wide Web, and follow developments in this crucial election. Before next month's election, we'll check out the political parties' Web site and take a look at the candidates running for prime minister. But first, an introduction to politics, Israel style.

Understanding Israel's electoral system can be a bit daunting to a foreigner. The Ministry of Foreign Affairs has put together an impressive site which explains the country's system of government and the events which led to the election call [http://www.mfa.gov.il/mfa/go.asp?MFAH0d1c0].

A similar site (with a great name) is The Israeli Elections – Guide for the Perplexed [http://israeliculture.miningco.com/library/weekly/aa022299.htm].

There are several online services that do an excellent job of following the latest news. In Hebrew, the popular Yedioth Aharonot [http://www.elections-yedioth.co.il/] has a gigantic site that even includes a daily online poll. The daily Ha'aretz doesn't have a separate election section, but the authoritative newspaper does translate many articles into its English edition [http:// www3.haaretz.co.il/eng/].

Another good place to keep track of late news is at Yahoo [http://headlines.yahoo.com/Full_Coverage/World/Israel_Elections/] where you will also find links to articles in papers from around the world including the Arab press. Political junkies who need more, will appreciate the Jewish Telegraphic Agency's site [http://www.jta.org/elect.htm] as well as Israel Wire [http://www.israelwire.com/elections.html].

But if I had to recommend one site that has just about everything, it would be the Jerusalem Post's Israel Elections 99 Primer [http://www.jpost.co.il/Info/Elections99/index.shtml]. This is a marvelous site with extensive background about the history, the issues and the people making news. Some recent articles focussed on a wide range of topics: how demographic changes in Israel could determine election results; a look at what Jordan, Egypt and the Palestinians are saying about the campaign; and whether political polling could affect election results. It's no wonder that the Jerusalem Post Web site is considered one of the best newspaper sites anywhere.

Every candidate has one goal in mind – to get to the Knesset. But you don't have to get elected to get there. All you need is a keyboard to enter the Knesset [http://www.knesset.gov.il/knesset/englhome.htm]. At this bilingual site, you can learn how Israel's parliament functions, and watch debates online (when in session). If you get tired, take a seat in the Chagall State Hall and watch a movie about those incredible mosaics and tapestries [http://www.knesset.gov.il/knesset/tour/etour7.htm]. You probably won't bump into any members of Knesset wondering down these virtual corridors but there are e-mail addresses for all MK's if you want to pass along some advice [http://www.knesset.gov.il/knesset/mk/14/mkindex_eng.htm].

Next time, parties and personalities running for the 15th Knesset.

Jewish Life

Facts and imagination

The River Midnight*, by Lilian Nattel (Random House of Canada, $32).

The four major characters of this engrossing first novel are women who are referred to as vilda hayas, wild animals. They are exuberant, filled with life – each determined to find happiness in her own way.

Books
Bernard Baskin

This quest for joy in life isn't easy in Blaszka, a Polish shtetl in late 19th-century Poland. The most colorful and free-spirited of the quartet is the divorced Misha. She is the village mid-wife, dispenser of herbs, and keeper of all the town secrets – including the identity of the father of her child whom she delivers publicly on the very eve of Yom Kippur.

Hannah-Leah, wife of Hershel the butcher, manages to find a measure of happiness, even though she is constantly troubled by her childlessness.

Instead of becoming a teacher, her childhood dream, Faygele, who has the soul of a writer, ends up as the mother of five with a daughter who is arrested for subversive political activities.

Zisa Sarah emigrates to America where she dies. Her orphaned children return home where they are raised by Alta Fruma, one of the shtetl's most resilient and complex characters.

The story of these women and their families is deftly and skillfully interwoven, against the background of a community – still living in the shadow of pogroms – rife with beliefs in spirit, demons and the fearful realm of the supernatural.

The menfolk, less central to the novel's action, nonetheless present vivid figures – from Rabbi Berekh, influenced more than he knows by Misha, to Hayim the feckless water-carrier.

All of Blaszka must eventually confront and come to terms with the violent changes of the new century, when all beliefs and ideas are challenged by the irreverent rush of modernity.

The River Midnight, researched and written over a three-year period, brings to mind such writers as Isaac Bashevis Singer, I.L. Peretz and Shalom Aleichem, but the author has her own distinctive literary style and a singular approach to the mysteries and intricacies of shtetl life.

Nattel, 42, the daughter of Polish-born Holocaust survivors, was born in Montreal and now lives in Toronto.

This novel, already widely praised, is a splendid achievement. It is a combination of fact and imagination that conjures up a rich, multi-layered half-forgotten world.

Prisoner 88, the Man in Stripes*, by Roy D. Tanenbaum (University of Calgary Press – paperbound).

Sigmund Sobolewski is an angry elderly man who is feisty, outspoken and courageous. He denounces racists, excoriates Holocaust deniers and demands that the Catholic Church – his church – ceases sanitizing or interpreting the Holocaust as less than the horror it was.

He remains irrepressible in his self-appointed mission, despite the disapproval of family and community members.

Sobolewski spent 55 months in Auschwitz and suffered the depredations of the Nazis. As a member of the camp fire brigade, he saw the valiant attempt of the participants in the failed Sonderkommando revolt at crematorium IV at Auschwitz.

Rabbi Roy Tanenbaum of Toronto's Beth Tzedec Synagogue, met and worked with the subject of his biography in Calgary, where Sobolewski created the Auschwitz Awareness Society of Canada.

In his striped camp uniform, No. 88 is an unsung hero, unceasing in his denunciation of those who would downscale or deny the Jewish tragedy.

The author recounts this story in a manner that is unflaggingly absorbing. This inspiring life story of an indomitable personality is available at Toronto Jewish book stores.

Fackenheim says Holocaust museum should be devoted to Jews only

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

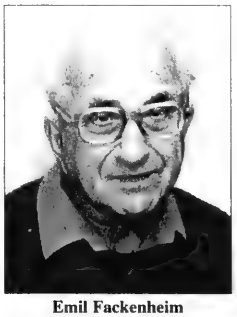
TORONTO — A Holocaust museum in Ottawa should be devoted only to the memory of the six million Jews killed by the Nazis, said Emil Fackenheim, professor emeritus of philosophy, University of Toronto.

The 83-year-old internationally famous academic gave this answer to a question posed by Gerda Freiberg, former chair of the Ontario region, Canadian Jewish Congress.

Freiberg, an activist for the museum, said the Canadian government has promised land in Ottawa for a Holocaust museum, but recent events indicate there is a desire by some groups to memorialize the tragedies in Rwanda, Somalia and Serbia.

"Should we insist that it be for the Holocaust?" she asked

"As a German Jew, I say there is a sharp difference between the Holocaust and what is going on in other places," said Fackenheim. "They murdered six million Jews. Why did they resort to murder?



Emil Fackenheim

Because they said our race was inferior to the Aryans. This is a fundamental difference. It can't be sidestepped or ignored. It ought to be stated that such a thing can never happen again."

In his reply, Fackenheim, a Fellow at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, who now lives in Israel, said the late Leo Baeck and Primo Levi, who both survived the Holocaust, were the "ultimate witnesses" to its tragedy.

Earlier, in his lecture at York University, on Why is the Holocaust Unique? Fackenheim said that Baeck, his former teacher, took his secrets to the grave because he did not want to alarm the British liberal Jewish community, and that Levi committed suicide because of the Holocaust.

The senate chamber at York University had a standing room only audience for his address. It was hosted by Prof. Anne Bayefsky, director, Centre for Refugee Studies.

He recounted how his one-legged uncle, Adoph, in his native town of Halle, had been insulted by the Nazis. Fackenheim had learned on a visit in 1993, that his uncle had been transported to Buchenwald and eventually murdered on orders of Heinrich Himmler.

"Himmler believed it was cowardly just to murder adult Jews, so he killed babies too."

On his planned trip to Halle next year to get an honorary degree, Fackenheim said he would teach the Germans about the English word "recovery".

He said Germany has to "recover" its golden age of the past and that the Jewish people need a "recovery" to ancient values.

Shock, sadness in Croatia

By JILL CRACOWER
Special to The CJN

Every morning for the past few weeks, I have awakened to find the front page of the newspaper devoted to the Kosovo crisis. Every evening, pictures of war flash before me on the television news. Never before has a news issue both touched and angered me as much as this one.

Guest Voices

I spent one month last summer in Croatia. Three classmates and I volunteered at an orphanage just outside Zagreb, which houses children whose parents either were killed or are unable to care for them as a result of the recent war. Many of my family and friends were surprised to hear where I was going, seeing Croatia as an unlikely summer destination for a "nice Jewish girl."

I was not quite sure what Croatia would be like, and like my family and friends, I was a bit nervous to be venturing off to a country so recently touched by war. But to my surprise, Croatia is a country filled with natural beauty and friendly people. The clear blue water of the Adriatic is a great source of pride to Croatians, and is just one of the many natural wonders that used to attract many European tourists to the country.

While Zagreb, with its beautiful opera house and European charm was virtually untouched by the war, signs of battle are evident in other parts of the country.

One sweltering day in May, the four of us, as well as some children and workers from the orphanage, took a four-hour drive to the city of Vukovar, a Serbian stronghold during the war. Before entering the city, we were told that it had been destroyed in its entirety.

Despite this, when we arrived, I could not believe what I saw before my eyes. Almost every home, school and building had been utterly ruined; the luckiest of them just had bullet holes in its walls.

Driving through the town, however, was a mere preface for what I was about to see at the Red Cross station. There, tents were set up, where workers performed tasks such as sorting through dead bodies and their possessions and building crosses for the fallen soldiers' graves.

Behind all the tents was a huge pit, a mass grave. My stomach was in knots, my body numb. I did not know that it was possible to experience such utter shock and sadness at the same time. And as our visit proceeded, visions and thoughts of the Holocaust plagued my mind.

Ever since elementary school, I have been exposed to movies, pictures and the complete history of the Holocaust. I always felt a certain sadness in knowing that six million of my fellow Jews were murdered for no rational or comprehensible reason. I also know how lucky I am that my grandparents were able to leave Europe during the war. But I was never truly able to fathom what the Holocaust was all about.

The fact that the Holocaust was covered in such great depth in high school is proof of how strong our community is, especially here in Montreal. From what I have observed, Jews are not only bonded by religion, but also by history and to some extent, by culture. Not only do Jews have the intent of preserving our distinct history and learning from it, but we also seem to have an intrinsic capacity and desire to help other Jews, to come to their aid in good times and in times of trouble. It is this commitment to our common history and to our fellow Jews which has kept the Jewish nation alive for thousands of years.

But do we not also have a responsibility as human beings to help our neighbors regardless of their religion? Can we, as a people, not relate to the tremendous suffering incurred by the people of Croatia, and can we not relate to the people of Kosovo and commit ourselves to bettering their situation?

Of course, there are Jews who support worldwide crises such as the one occurring in the former Yugoslavia. However, it seems like these "non-Jewish" catastrophes have never truly been our focus. And I am left asking why.

We constantly reiterate the words, never again; we cannot let such an atrocity as the Holocaust happen again. However, Vukovar's destruction is proof that holocausts are presently happening all over the world.

So while people, especially family and Jewish acquaintances may have been shocked to hear that I was going to Croatia last summer, I learned a lot about myself as a Jew. Some of the kids at the orphanage didn't know what being Jewish meant, Croatia being a predominantly Catholic country.

However, I learned there that Croatians and Jews are more connected than we think. Both Jews and Croatians are infinitely proud of their culture and homelands and devoted to their religion. What is unfortunate, however, is that one of our most blatant connections is a history of genocide.

Israel Funwalk 99 Filled With Surprises!

Some things old...some things new...and some things nobody will even talk about. That's what in store for participants in the UJA Federation Israel Funwalk 99, Sunday, May 30th.

"After last year's tremendous turnout, we're pulling out all the stops to make sure this year's Walk is even better," says Fran Grundman, who is co-chairing Funwalk 99 with Harvey Cooperberg and Corey Mandel. "People will just have to come out and see for themselves what we've got planned."

Last year, over 15,000 community members stepped out for the largest Walk for Israel in UJA Federation history, raising a record $250,000 for Jews in need. The historic event ended at Ontario Place with a community-wide celebration of Israel's 50th anniversary.

This year's Walk, which also begins at Nathan Phillips Square and ends at Ontario Place, includes a modified route through old downtown Jewish Toronto, an additional checkpoint and a clothing drive run by Jewish Family and Child Service's Just A Second Shop. A brand new Walk web site www.feduja.org/funwalk99 features up-to-date information on everything from Walk trivia to incentive programs. Visitors can even click on to the various checkpoints to learn about their geographical significance to the Jewish community. For example, did you know that Nathan Phillips Square was named after Toronto's first Jewish Mayor?

But participants can also expect the unexpected such as never-seen-before entertainment at Nathan Phillips Square, presented by Corey Mandel Entertainment, surprise celebrity guests at various checkpoints and tons of goodies and prizes along the way.

One secret too good to keep is a special appearance by Steven Page of the Bare Naked Ladies, who will be performing at Nathan Phillps Square along with Liberty Silver and The Satrs Band. The Festival at Ontario Place will feature a gigantic kosher BBQ, live entertainment and representatives of UJA Federation beneficiary agencies.

Harvey Cooperberg

Corey Mandel

"This a great opportunity to educate thousands of UJA Federation supporters about where their contributions go locally," says Cooperberg.

Special recruitment programs, such as the Bub-n-Zaid-a-thon, offer participants of all ages chances to win great prizes. Walkers over age 18 who trek in groups of 10 or more are also eligible to win prizes by registering at Nathan Phillips Square.

For every $25 raised before Friday May 14th, participants will receive a free pass to Ontario Place valid on the day of the Walk, as well as a free Roots Funwalk t-shirt while supplies last. Walkers who raise $50 by Friday, May 14th will have their names entered in a draw to win a free ticket to Israel courtesy of El Al Israel Airlines, Raptors, Maple Leaf and Blue Jay tickets, movie passes, sports equipment and much more. For every $500 raised, walkers will win a Nintendo Gameboy.

Recruitment volunteers have already begun distributing Israel Funwalk 99 sponsorship kits at dozens of Jewish day and supplementary schools around the GTA. All others can pick up their kits at UJA Federation offices, 5th floor, 4600 Bathurst Street, the Bathurst Jewish Centre or the Bloor JCC.

For more information or to volunteer call (416) 631-5700.

Thousands converged on the streets of downtown Toronto at last year's Israel 50 Funwalk.

After delivering over 100 Moslem Kosovar refugees from Macedonia to Israel last week, the Jewish Agency, supported by the worldwide UJA Federation Network, is intensifying its humanitarian relief to Kosovar refugees.

"We will continue to send planes filled with supplies to Albania as long as there is a need," said Salai Meridor, Chairman of the Executive of the Jewish Agency, in an interview with jewish toronto. "It's just the right thing to do."

As the refugee crisis in Albania grew, Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu called Meridor directly to ask the Jewish Agency to intervene. "It took only minutes for our board to approve our mission and in a matter of hours we were ready to act," explained Meridor, who became the head of the Agency just a few weeks ago.

The Jewish Agency, has sent five flights carrying food, blankets, tents and medical supplies to refugee camps throughout Albania and Macedonia. Over $750,000 was raised at a refugee relief rock concert, co-sponsored by the Agency in Tel Aviv. Israelis have also donated $1 million through the UJA Federation affiliated Spirit of Israel Campaign toward the purchase of supplies and transportation costs for the relief effort.

"The response from Israelis, as well Jews around the world, has been overwhelming," noted Meridor. "Without the Agency's strategic partnership with Jewish communities in every country, we could not have mounted such an effective collective response. The difference between now and 50 years ago when Jews were being slaughtered is that now we can rescue ourselves and help others," he added.

The Agency is also working closely with other humanitarian relief agencies, such as the Joint Distribution Committee, which is caring for 250 Belgrade Jews who fled to Budapest, Hungary last month.

Over the past three weeks, the Jewish Agency has sponsored pilot trips for nearly 200 Yugoslavian Jews considering aliyah. The mercy mission, which brought Moslem Kosovar refugees to Israel for a six-month stay, arrived on Yom Hashoah – Holocaust Remembrance Day. "The atmosphere at Ben Gurion Airport was filled with emotion," recalled Jewish Agency spokesman Michael Jankelowitz, one of dozens of Agency and government officials who greeted the new arrivals.

Immediately following the mission of mercy, which took place as Jews around the world marked Holocaust Remembrance Day, an additional 80 Jewish refugees from Belgrade arrived in Israel as temporary guests of the Jewish Agency's Department of Immigration. The group of young adults and mothers with children,, is participating in a pilot project to examine options for making aliyah in the future. Two additional flights of Jews from Belgrade are arriving this week.

"Not only do we refuse to remain silent," Meridor emphasized, "we are opening our hearts and our doors to those who are suffering."

UJA Fund Grows

Members of Toronto's Jewish community have heard the calls for help from Kosovar refugees thousands of miles away. Now they're calling by the hundreds to donate money to UJA Federation's Kosovo Relief Fund.

Money raised locally and by UJA Federation campaigns across Canada is being channeled to the Jewish Agency in support of a major humanitarian relief effort underway in Albania. Donations in Toronto can be made by calling (416) 631-5705 or by mailing a cheque to UJA Kosovo Relief Fund, 4600 Bathurst Street, Toronto, M2R 3V2. To date, over $25,000 has been raised.

For many, the decision to reach out has as much to do with images from the past as the harsh reality of the present.

"I couldn't stand by and do nothing while watching history repeat itself," explains Robin Kachuck, who made a contribution shortly after receiving a fax from UJA Federation. "As Jews we have a responsibility to all humanity," notes Richard Sacks. "Our support is the best way to teach our children valuable lessons from the past."

"I feel an obligation to react strongly whenever people are threatened because of their race, religion or ethnicity, adds Howard Tanenbaum, who along with Jillian Pivnick and several other donors, responded to Beth Tzedec's Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl plea for community action during a recent sermon.

Frydman-Kohl urged his congregants to make contributions to the fund equivalent to the cost of having two more guests at the Seder table. "I thought it was a very effective way to motivate people to give," adds Pivnik. "I'm very confident UJA Federation will make sure the money goes where it's needed."

An Eyewitness Account

For 32-year-old Zeljko Mrcarica and his family, life in Nis, 240 km south of Belgrade, has become a surreal juxtaposition of incessant aerial bombing attacks and routine daily life. In an e-mail interview with jewish toronto, Mrcarica shared some of his most recent experiences.

"I go to work everyday," explains Mrcarica, an associate professor of electrical engineering at the University of Nis. "My office is one of the only ones left intact after bombs destroyed a nearby tobacco company but it's hard for me to concentrate on my research," he confesses. "I spend most of my time reading e-mails about the war."

"We still receive salaries and one can buy necessities and groceries in the stores except for fruits and I have enough petrol for my car."

But that's where normalcy ends for Mrcarica, his wife Jasna and son Markov, who celebrated his 2nd birthday on April 6th with less pomp than befits a youngster's birthday party. "All the guests came separately because it is very dangerous and complicated to travel while air raids are going on," explains Mrcarica. "The risk is too big if many people gather in buildings and something terrible happens.

"Spending more time with my son is the best thing to come out of this war – the only time I feel good is when I take him to the playground – that is, until the sirens go and Markov gets frightened. We tell him that the train is passing by.

"For me, I just want to go to sleep and wake up from this nightmare – a nightmare that takes place in the middle of the day."

Hadassah-WIZO supports new program for autistic kids

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Hadassah-WIZO is supporting a new assessment, treatment and research program for autistic children in Israel.

The program, which began last September, is run by renowned cognitive psychologist Reuven Feuerstein at the Hadassah-WIZO of Canada Research Institute in Jerusalem for children with autism, a lifelong neurological disorder that affects speech, communication, social interaction and behavior.

The institute has been involved in educational work with Feuerstein since 1957, particularly in the area of Down syndrome.

"He's a magician. His sense of understanding of human beings and human behavior is far, far beyond what any of us understand. His success rate is absolutely phenomenal," said Pat Alpert, national Hadassah-WIZO president.

She has met with Feuerstein on many occasions and is particularly impressed by the fact that some of his former students with Down syndrome progressed to the point of being able to serve in the IDF.

In Canada, she noted, some of Feuerstein's methods have been used in the penal system and with the aboriginal population. Feuerstein will speak at Hadassah-WIZO's national convention in Ottawa this November.

Last November, along with a busload of executive members of Hadassah-WIZO from across Canada, Alpert visited the research institute to meet with its staff and observe the new program's severely autistic children, who range in age from eight to 12. There are currently about three dozen children in the program. Eventually, it is anticipated it will serve 100.

"I feel very blessed that I have healthy children," said Alpert. "But I also feel it's really a privilege that one is able to help children, to heal children, and to enable them to progress...I feel proud that we're part of it."

Pat Alpert, left, national Hadassah-WIZO president, has spoken with Dr. Reuven Feuerstein many times about his work with children.

רעדאגירט פון ש. ליפשיץ

פֿאַרשאַפֿט זיך אַ ביסל גייסטיקן פֿאַרגענעגן

פון אַלעק סילווער

איך האָב דאָס לעצטנס געטאָן: זיך פֿאַרשאַפֿט אַ ביסל גייסטיקן פֿאַרגענעגן. עס האָט מיך גאָרנישט געקאָסטן, נאָר בלויז אַ ביסל צייט פון מיינע פֿריע שעה'ן, אָבער דער פֿאַרגענגען איז געווען אַ גרויסער. און געשען איז עס אַזוי:

וועג איך האָב געלייענט אין דער ייִדישער פּרעסע, אַז סיי־ווי אַפּגעמעקט די 50־סטע יאָרצייט נאָך פֿרץ הירשביין, איז מיר נעקומען אויפן נעדאַנק, אַז ס'איז שוין 60 יאָר, ווי איך האָב געלייענט זיינס אַ בוך. אַ חרטה־געפיל האָט מיך באַהערשט. עס איז נישט ריכטיק. עס דאַרף אַזוי נישט זיין . . . פֿאַרוואָס האָט עס אַזוי לאַנג געדויערט? . . .

פֿאָרן אויסברוך פון דער צווייטער וועלט־מלחמה האָבן מיר געלייענט די שאָפונגען פון די ייִדישע שרייבערס, אַריינגערעכנט אויך פֿרץ הירשביין. אין צייט פון דער מלחמה האָבן מיר מורא געהאַט אַפֿילו צו האַלטן אַ ייִדיש בוך אין הויז. אגב, באַלד נאָך אַריינמאַרש פון די נאַציס אין אונדזער שטעטל, האָבן מיר באַגראָבן אין מיין פּעטערס גאָרטן אַ קאַסטן מיט ייִדישע ביכער, וואָס מיר האָבן פֿאַרמאַגט. אין די קאָנצענטראַציע־לאַגערן האָבן מיר נישט געלייענט קיין ייִדישע ביכער. מיר האָבן דעמאָלט בכלל ווייניק געלייענט. אויב ס'איז אַריינגעפאַלן אין אונדזערע הענט אַן אַלט שטיקל צייטונג, אין פּוילש אָדער ייִדיש, איז עס בײַ אונדז געווען די גרעסטע מציאה. די שטיקלער צייטונגען האָבן מיר געפונען אין מיסט, וואָס די פּוילישע אָדער ייִדישע „באַלעבאָטים" האָבן דאָרט אַריינגעוואָרפן, נאָכן אָפּעסן זייער מאָלצייט. און לאָמיר זיך מודה זיין: מיר זיינען געווען מער פֿראַינטערעסירט אין די קרישקעס, וואָס זיינען דאָרט פֿאַרבליבן, ווי אין דעם עדרוקטן וואָרט.

פון צייט צו צייט זיינען מיר געגאַנגען אויף רעפֿעראַטן, לעקציעס און ליטעראַטור־אָונטן, וואו מען האָט דערמאָנט, אַרום־געריידט, שטודירט און ציטירט די שאָפונגען פון אונדזערע באַרימטע קלאַסיקערס און שרייבערס. מיר האָבן אָבער זייער וויניק צייט אָנועקגעגעבן אויף צו לייענען די אַריגינעלע ווערק, וואָס מיר האָבן געלייענט אין אונדזער יוגנט.

אין דעם פּרט האָב איך באַוואונדערט מיין פֿאָטער ע"ה. מיט אָרום דרייסיק יאָר צורק, וועג ער האָט „ריטייערט", האָט ער אָוועקגעגעבן אַ סך צייט אויף לייענען ביכער. ער האָט שטאַרק ליב נעהאַט צו לייענען, אָבער אין די יאָרן, וועג ער איז געווען פֿאַרנומען מיט פּרנסה, האָט ער נישט געהאַט צופֿיל צייט פֿאַר אַזאַ „לוקסוס". ער האָט געלייענט די ייִדישע פּרעסע פון לאַנד און פון אויסלאַנד. ער האָט נישט ליב געהאַט צו לייענען די ביכער וועגן די חורבן־יאָרן. זיי האָבן אים פֿאַרשאַפֿן צופֿיל צער און עגמת־נפֿש, זייענדיק אַליין אַ שארית־הפּליטה־צייק. האָט ער באשלאָסן אַנצוהייבן, אַזוי צו זאָגן, פון „בראשית", צוריקגיין און וויידער אָנהייבן מיט די ייִדישע קלאַסיקערס. איך פֿלעג אים פֿרין יעדע צווייַ וואָכן אין דער ייִדישער ביבליאָטעק, וואו ער האָט זיך געפֿרייט, וויַ אַ קינד אין אַ שפּיליצייג־געשעפֿט. ער האָט אָנגעהויבן מיט אַלע ווערק פון מענדעלע מוכר ספֿרים, נאָכגעפֿאָלגט מיט שלום־עליכם, י. ל. פּרץ, יוסף אָפּאָטאָשו, פֿרץ הירשביין, שלום אַש און נאָך נאָך. ער פֿלעגט מיר שטענדיק זאָגן וועגן דעם פֿאַרגעניגן, וואָס די ביכער פֿאַרשאַפֿן אים.

האָב איך באַשלאָסן אויסצובעסערן מיין גרויסן חטא. ווי נאָר איך האָב נעקענט אָפּשפּאָרן אַ פּריַיען טאָג, בין איך אָוועק אין דער טאָראָנטער ייִדישער ביבליאָטעק. יאָ, חשובער לייענער, מיר האָבן אַ גרויסע, שיינע, ייִדישע ביבליאָטעק מיט טויזנטער ביכער, וואָס בעסן זיך געלייענט צו ווערן. דאָרטן האָב איך געפונען אַ ביכל געזאַמלטע שריפטן פון פֿרץ הירשביין, אַרויסגעגעבן אין 1916. דאָס ביכל נעמט אריין פיר דראַמעס, צווישן וועלכע עס געפינט זיך די פּיעסע „גרינע פעלדער".

Haifa mayor visits to promote 'awakening beauty'

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Nestled on the slopes of Mount Carmel, abutting the Mediterranean Sea, Haifa has always been known for its serene beauty.

While Tel Aviv to the south conjures images of bustling night life and frantic pace, Haifa has been saddled with the unfortunate monicker of sleeping beauty. Haifa's current mayor, Amram Mitzna, prefers to describe his city as the awakening beauty.

In the past, he acknowledged, Haifa fell behind when it came to municipal development, but in his six-year administration, things have changed. "Now, we're trying to promote the city."

Mitzna, 54, was recently in Toronto for a brief visit as part of a six-day trip that included stops in New York and Philadelphia. "The purpose of the trip was to promote the city of Haifa and to let people know about it," Mitzna said.

Included in the mayor's Toronto itinerary was a reception for Saul and Toby Feldberg, two patrons who support educational projects in Haifa. The Feldbergs, he pointed out, have established the Centre for Advanced Learning to help integrate children with learning disabilities into the city's mainstream education system. Financed also by the city of Haifa and other private donors, the centre helps educate 6,200 children in four branches. One of its centres, supported by the city's Arab population of 35,000-40,000, serves Arabic speaking children, Mitzna said.

A career soldier who rose to the rank of major general before retiring, Mitzna took the opportunity of last week's reception to promote a pet project that aids "children at risk," those who come from broken families, who suffer abuse or who are too poor to afford to eat well. The children are taken to one of 10 city facilities where they receive hot meals, get assistance with their homework, and are given a stress-free time to play, Mitzna said.

Promoting childhood education and improving quality of life have been among the mayor's top priorities since being elected six years ago. Re-elected in November with 65 percent of the vote, Mitzna's agenda has focused on attracting business, beautifying the city and fostering good relations between Arabs and Jews.

The recent naming of a young Arab woman from Haifa as Miss Israel was a symbolic indication of the improving status of Arabs in the city, but more significantly, an Arab councillor was recently appointed deputy to the mayor. In addition, "a lot of resources are being allocated to the Arab community," Mitzna said. "I'm pushing it more than before."

Even before he was elected in 1993, Haifa was known "as a very liberal, tolerant city...What we did is make it a real unique [part of] the city so people would come [from across Israel] to see it and to learn about it."

In recent years, Haifa has "rolled out the red carpet and cut through the bureaucracy to help attract industry," Mitzna, a Labor party member, said. The city has also invested heavily in infrastructure improvement. The result has been an influx of business, particularly in research and development. Three blue chip U.S. firms – Intel, IBM and Microsoft – have located R & D facilities in the city, he noted.

As a result, unemployment in Haifa has dropped to six percent, well below the national average of nine percent and down from 12 percent when he took office, Mitzna said.

Haifa also has ambitious plans to clean up the heavily polluted Kishon River and to monitor smog in the area. With its Carmel National Park, the Baha'i Gardens and neighborhood parks, Haifa has the highest proportion of green space of any other Israeli city, Mitzna said.

The Baha'i community is planning to invest $300 million (US) to renovate its gardens, which will make it a "wonder of the world," he predicted.

Borrowing a page from his career as a general, Mitzna has mobilized the citizenry in civic improvement plans. Every year before Passover, individuals, organizations and companies pitch in to clean Haifa's streets and parks.

"I really think after six years of being mayor that there are many similarities between military leadership and running a city," Mitzna said. "You administer a city, not just as a manager, but as a leader.

"It's important to talk with the people, motivate people and make them feel that they belong...If you have motivated citizens, the sky's the limit with what you can do with them."

Mitzna's 30-year military career culminated with a posting as head of operations of the general staff, the number three position behind Chief of Staff Ehud Barak, now leader of the Labor party, and Barak's deputy, Amnon Lipkin-Shahak, who is the number two man in Israel's Centre party.

Would Mitzna ever consider joining the ex-generals in the national political ring? "I prefer to be head of the foxes, than to be the tail of the lions," he said.

Toronto's Tau Omega joins largest Jewish fraternity

By DAVID SILVER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO —The dreams of 33 University of Toronto (U of T) students came true last month, when their organization, Tau Omega, was officially inaugurated as a chapter of Alpha Epsilon Pi, the largest Jewish fraternity in North America.

As a result of Tau Omega's volunteer work in the Jewish community, Alpha Epsilon Pi's executive speeded up the U of T chapter's status as a chartered member.

The installation banquet, held at the King Edward Hotel, brought 150 Jewish men and women together, among them Alpha Epsilon Pi's international executive.

The festivities, which included singing and dancing, were capped off with the presentation of Alpha Epsilon Pi's charter designation to Tau Omega president Harley Gold.

"This was a night to remember," Gold said. "This evening...the University of Toronto and the Jewish community together welcomed a truly remarkable organization to their ranks.

There are more than 100 chapters in Alpha Epsilon Pi, established at New York University in 1913. The fraternity's mission is to develop Jewish community leaders for the future.

Its alumnae include Jerry Reinsdorf, owner of the Chicago Bulls; former Illinois governor Samuel Shapiro; and NHL commissioner Gary Bettman.

Seven male students established the U of T's Tau Omega chapter in January of 1998. In just over a year, the membership has grown to 33, making Tau Omega the largest fraternity on campus.

During this time Tau Omega brothers teamed up with Jewish Campus Services, organizing one of the largest clothing drives in the history of U of T.

The fraternity also worked with the National Council of Jewish Women, packaging and delivering more than 120 boxes of food for the needy before Passover .

Other chartered Alpha Epsilon Pi chapters in Canada are at York and McGill universities and the University of Western Ontario. Member chapters without charters can be found at Dalhousie and McMaster universities and the University of British Columbia.

For Information, check Tau Omega's Web site at i.am/aepi and Alpha Epsilon Pi at aepi.org.

Free air fare offered for early bird Hebrew U students

TORONTO — The Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem (CFHU) is offering free air fare for some students registering for full-year programs at the Rothberg International School at the Hebrew University.

The offer was made possible as a result of a grant from the Rothberg school, where fees and expenses are calculated in U.S. dollars. Air fare will be awarded to the first 75 students who apply to the national office of the Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University with valid acceptance for the 1999/2000 academic year.

Students will qualify based on the date of application receipt at the national office of CFHU, not on the date of acceptance granted by the Hebrew University.

The one-year program is open to qualified undergraduates who have completed at least one year of university, graduate students interested in Hebrew U program options, and high school students who fulfil the requirements of the freshman program. They have the option of pursuing course work related to their degree program at their home university where applicable, or enrolling in courses offered in Judaic, Israel or Middle East studies. Credits can be transferred, depending on the regulations of the home university.

Jonathan Farber, a Toronto student currently attending the Rothberg school, says, "My major at home is business/economics, but I have put it on hold so that I can take some of the Israel and Middle East studies courses offered at the Rothberg International School. I'm currently registered in The Defence of Israel, Contemporary Israeli Politics and The History of the Middle East. Living in Israel while learning about its history and its evolution is a remarkable exprience."

According to Mark Gryfe, executive vice-president of CFHU, "We are focusing on offering as many opportunities as possible for students to study at the Hebrew University. We want to ensure that the maximum number of eligible Canadian students have that experience. The free air fare offer will [help] more students turn their dream into a reality."

The free air fare offer coincides with the completion of the Matching Funds Scholarship Program, which has expanded financial support for Ontario students to study at the Hebrew University. The Matching Funds Campaign was a partnership between the government of Ontario, eight Ontario universities and the community.

The CFHU sends approximately 50 to 60 students annually to the Rothberg International School. Its goal is to double the number of students attending Rothberg each year.

For more information about the free air fare offer and the Rothberg International School, call Merie Goldman at 1-888-HEBREWU.

Rabbi gets $130,000 in wrongful dismissal suit

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — An Ontario court has awarded a rabbi $130,000 in damages in a wrongful dismissal suit he brought against the St. Catharines synagogue where he had served for 25 years.

The court blasted Congregation B'nai Israel for having acted in a "cruel, abusive, insolent and hurtful" manner toward Rabbi Joseph Ben-David, whose contract was not renewed in 1994.

Justice William Festeryga of the Ontario Court's general division, found that the rabbi was employed through a series of short-term contracts, some of which had been shoddily executed.

The judge also found that the synagogue had acted "in a most cruel and insolent manner" when Rabbi Ben-David and his son were not recognized as part of a minyan during Sukkot services at the synagogue.

In another instance, the rabbi was told he was no longer welcome at the synagogue he once led. Such conduct is "malicious," the judge said in his 25-page ruling handed down earlier this month.

The court awarded $110,000 in damages for wrongful dismissal, and $20,000 in punitive damages against the synagogue.

Court heard that Rabbi Ben-David, now 62, began his employment at the synagogue in 1969 as a teacher and cantor. Through the years, he progressed to assistant rabbi, and finally, encouraged by the synagogue to obtain his smichah (rabbinic ordination), to rabbi.

In November 1994, he was informed the congregation would not renew his contract, and he was given nine months' notice. He argued he was entitled to 30 months' notice because of his length of employment and record of service.

The judge agreed, saying the synagogue, over the years, encouraged and supported the rabbi and "owed him the decency of explaining why his contract would not be renewed. They did not. I find such action detrimentally affected the sense of identity, self-worth and emotional well-being of [Rabbi Ben-David]."

The case serves as a cautionary tale for synagogues that use short-term contracts to employ their spiritual leaders.

Even though the rabbi was "looking for a long-term commitment," the synagogue used short-term agreements, and the rabbi was "unaware" that they did not contain renewal clauses.

"It never occurred" to the rabbi "that any of the documents that he signed, set out fixed terms and provisions for notice of renewal or non-renewal of his employment," the judgment states. "He signed the contracts as they were presented to him. His prime concern was the amount of the remuneration. He never expected that the [synagogue] would do anything to compromise his position."

It was never the rabbi's intention to be employed for a limited term, the court ruled. He "relied completely on the [synagogue] to treat him fairly," and he was "never told" of fixed terms.

On the balance of probabilities, "both parties considered [the rabbi] to be a long-term employee [who] could stay as long as wished, subject to reasonable notice."

The synagogue countered that the rabbi was fired for cause, "which came as a complete surprise to [Rabbi Ben-David] because he alleges that none of these complaints were ever brought to his attention." In fact, the synagogue even provided him with "a glowing letter of recommendation."

Arguing the rabbi was dismissed for cause was "a personal attack on [him] and his family to hurt them," the court stated.

The congregation withdrew the reason of cause for dismissal shortly before the trial began.

The court took special notice of the nature of the rabbi's employment, noting that he prepared children for important times in their lives, taught classes and acted as principal of the Hebrew school. He served as cantor and rabbi. "All of these duties are significant," the judge wrote.

The court found that the contractual arrangements between the shul and the rabbi over the years had been lax.

Some contracts were signed, others were not. There were periods when the rabbi worked without a contract. The agreements "were presented in a manner that leads me to the conclusion that these were not important documents to be relied upon," the judge found.

The judge also found that a 1996 letter sent to congregants "was calculated to put [the rabbi] in a bad light for trying to enforce his rights in the civil courts."

In 1997, the synagogue lost an application to bring the dispute with Rabbi Ben-David to a beit din.

Rabbi Ben-David told The CJN last week that he did his best to avoid a civil lawsuit.

"It was not a question of money, but of justice," he said.

Campus launched

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Community leaders and politicians speaking at the groundbreaking ceremony for the $30-million Jewish Community Campus, said the project is a tangible expression of the Jewish community's confidence in its future in Quebec.

Quebec cabinet ministers Robert Perreault and André Boisclair, Montreal Mayor Pierre Bourque and three members of his executive committee, and Martin Cauchon, federal secretary of state for economic development were on hand for the ceremony, which was attended by 200 people.

All three levels of government have contributed $1.3 million each to the project.

"This campus is much more than a series of buildings," said Robert Vineberg, the project's chair. "The Montreal Jewish Community Campus is a powerful symbol of one of the great goals of this community: to build a pluralist Jewish community within the context of pluralistic Quebec and Canadian societies."

The campus, he said, symbolizes "a future of renewal and hopefulness, of purpose, of vigor and of new opportunity."

The ceremony took place on the site where the Gelber Conference Centre will be erected. It is located between the main FEDERATION CJA Cummings House and the Golden Age Association, a major component of the expansion.

The centre was donated by Nahum and Sheila Gelber, former Montrealers now living in Israel.

About $12 million is to be spent on the north side of the campus, which will include the construction of a fifth floor on top of Cummings House. An estimated $18 million is to be allocated to the south side of the campus, which encompasses the YM-YWHA and Saidye Bronfman Centre.

About 80 percent of the total amount of money raised, comes from the community, according to FEDERATION CJA executive director Maxyne Finkelstein.

At the groundbreaking ceremony it was announced that Charles and Andrea Bronfman, who now live in New York City, have made a significant donation. They have endowed the Jewish Education Council and Montreal Israel Experience Centre that will occupy the new floor of Cummings House.

Top benefactors, the Cummings family, will have the north campus named for them as Cummings Square.

Survivor's story grips audience at Yom Hashoah service

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — Silence enveloped the packed auditorium at a recent Yom Hashoah service at Shaar Shalom Synagogue, when Steven Markus, a Holocaust survivor from Hungary, told his story.

A resident of Halifax since 1959, Markus recalled the day his parents were taken away to concentration camp by train. "They gave me a letter through the slats of the car, asking God to save us (him and his brother Frank) and telling me to take care of my brother.

"I was saved, and taken to a forced labor camp in 1944 at age 14. My brother and I later escaped to live with an uncle and aunt and eventually to be hidden by neighbors."

He was able to join the Hungarian Army – army officials didn't know he was a Jew – and so he was able to help prevent hundreds of Jewish children from going to concentration camps.

In 1945, Russia captured Budapest and forced the Markus brothers into a prisoner of war camp. When the war ended, the boys couldn't find their parents. They eventually went to Israel where Steven fought in the Israeli War of Independence.

Markus was the final speaker at the memorial service, which was attended by 250 people, among them, Nova Scotia representatives from the 1998 March of the Living, and members of all three parties in the Nova Scotia legislature.

There were also representatives from the Halifax Regional Municipality Council, the Armed Forces and the U.S. Consul General's office and several provincial judges, the Archbishop of Nova Scotia, and the acting executive director of the Nova Scotia Human Rights Commission.

Ronen stresses education

Memorial services were also held in Fredericton, Moncton, and Saint John, N.B., and St. John's, Nfld.

In Halifax, guest speaker Moshe Ronen, president of the Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), stressed that education was the key to preventing another Holocaust.

"(Canada) lags behind the rest of the world by not having a national Holocaust Museum," Ronen said. "It is essential one be built in Ottawa, for through its presence we would educate future generations of Canadians on anti-Semitism and racism."

Ronen said a $25,000 (US) grant given to the Atlantic Jewish Council by the Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany will go to Holocaust education in the region.

He praised Canada's efforts in Kosovo, specifically the offer to take in refugees, "something the country did not do for European Jews during World War II.

"There was no safe haven then, only because the victims were Jews. Now the world has learned not to stand by in the face of annihilation."

He said Canadian Jewish Congress is urging every provincial government to include Holocaust education on its curriculum; New Brunswick is the only province currently doing so.

Ronen, accompanied by CJC executive vice president Jack Silverstone, met with Nova Scotia deputy premier Don Downe to discuss education and other matters.

During his whirlwind visit to Halifax, Ronen also addressed the Halifax Rotary club, the second oldest Rotary club in Canada, and he met with the editorial board of the Chronicle-Herald and Mail-Star, Nova Scotia's major, and independent, daily newspapers.

B.C. government honors Holocaust survivors

By SUZANNE KORT
Special to The CJN

VICTORIA — Mariette Doduck of Vancouver was one of 15 Holocaust survivors recognized by Attorney General Ujjal Dosanjh from the floor of the B.C. Legislative Assembly on Yom Hashoah.

"We made history after all these years," Doduck said.

Dosanjh's office worked with the Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), Pacific region, to organize the event. On April 13, he read to the assembly an official government proclamation recognizing Holocaust Memorial Day in British Columbia. The day will be recognized annually, according to the Hebrew calendar.

British Columbia is the only government besides those in Israel and Ontario to give such official recognition.

The proclamation defined the Holocaust in terms of its cost to the Jewish community, as well as to other communities targeted by Nazis during World War II, and acknowledged the continued existence of genocide worldwide. The document confirmed the provincial government's commitment to protect "British Columbians from hate, racism and violence through legislation, education and example."

Holocaust Memorial Day recognized

A minute of silence in memory of those who died in the Holocaust followed a supportive response to the proclamation from Opposition leader, Gordon Campbell. It was a brief moment of thoughtful peace before the contentious legislative session that followed.

Representatives of several Jewish agencies joined the survivors in the western gallery overlooking the red carpeted assembly. Congregations Emanu-El, Har El, Schara Tzedeck, and the Okanagan Jewish Community were represented, as well as Vancouver and Victoria Jewish federations, CJC, Pacific region, the Louis Brier Home and Hospital, Na'amat Canada's Vancouver Council, State of Israel Bonds, Vancouver Peretz Institute, Vancouver Genealogical Society, and Holocaust education societies from Vancouver and Victoria.

A brief reception in the legislature's rotunda preceded the proclamation. There, Richard Kool of the Victoria Holocaust Education and Remembrance Society received a framed copy of the proclamation from Dosanjh to display in the island's only synagogue, Emanu-El. CJC, Pacific region chair, Zena Simces, accepted a copy on behalf of her agency, as did Dr. Robert Krell, founding president of the Vancouver Holocaust Centre Society for Education and Remembrance.

Survivor and distinguished musicologist, Dr. Peter Gary, thanked the MLAs and guests. Gary has shared his experiences and insights with thousands of Vancouver Island students.

Jessica Zimbler, a Victoria secondary student, read three poems written by local middle school students in response to programs such as Gary's Kids and Hate – Choice or Chance, organized by the Holocaust Education Society of Victoria.

Victoria's new rabbi, Rabbi David Seidenberg, managed to inject humor into the solemn occasion by quoting Rabbi Shammai from Pirkei Avot: "Love work, hate authority, and don't get friendly with the government."

While there may have been good reasons for this view in Rabbi Shammai's time as well as in our own, Rabbi Seidenberg reminded us that "it is easy to give words, but it is harder to give action. A declaration is both words and a deed. I trust and pray that these words and deeds will be followed by more deeds."

Rabbi Seidenberg ended the ceremony with a prayer for our country written by his predecessor in Victoria, Rabbi Victor Reinstein. The prayer encouraged Canadian leaders to practise compassion, to be a source of peace in the world and to ensure that "none will ever be too many for any people seeking refuge in our land of plenty."

Lawyers for skinheads seek stay of charges

Farber was questioned about his reaction to the anti-Roma demonstration while Magnish was asked about articles that quoted police sources about criminality in the Roma community.

Earlier, the defence source told The CJN that "Farber as head of an advocacy group should have jumped on [Chong's statement]."

He suggested that Congress is a politically influential group and said that "if police want to know if they can safely get away with prosecuting skinheads and not Chong, law enforcement need only pick up a newspaper."

During the course of questioning from three defence lawyers representing different accused, Farber was asked by all three whether Congress met with members of the Metro Toronto Police Hate Crimes Unit to discuss the case before charges were laid.

One lawyer's questions focused on Congress' ties to Attorney General Charles Harnick and to Michael Bernstein, the chief counsel of the Crown law office; another defence lawyer suggested Congress "collaborates" and has "influence" over the hate crimes unit.

Asked to comment on newspaper accounts of Chong's "pimping" statement, Farber agreed the councillor's remarks were "completely inappropriate." He also called them "cavalier," "insensitive," "intemperate" and "unhelpful," but in his view, they did not cross the line into promotion of hate.

Farber said Chong's apology was a key factor in his view that the remarks were not intended to promote hate.

Farber was asked by defence lawyer David Gomes whether he had been in contact with the Metro Police Hate Crimes Unit in advance of charges being laid. He responded that he had not, but that Congress made its views known through a news release.

He was also asked whether Congress had applied pressure and had acted forcefully to get charges laid.

Farber said Congress advocated charges in a public way and that "we're forceful when we feel the laws have been broken. Sometimes the police agree, sometimes they don't."

Responding to other questions from Gomes, Farber said he had "absolutely not" discussed the case with Ontario Attorney General Charles Harnick or Michael Bernstein, chief counsel of the Crown law office. (Bernstein had been subpoenaed to appear in court last week, but Crown attorneys were planning to ask the court to quash the subpoena.)

Hate Crimes Unit

Gomes also suggested that Farber had greater access to Harnick and Premier Mike Harris than other members of the public. Farber acknowledged he'd spoken to the two politicians and met them on occasions when they addressed the Jewish community.

Lawyer Harry Doan suggested in questioning that Farber "collaborates" with the Hate Crimes Unit. Farber said he keeps in touch with the unit and has participated in conferences attended by members of the unit. He rejected Doan's suggestion that he has "influence" over the unit, saying "influence is not a word I would use. We are an advocacy organization with known, acknowledged expertise on hate crimes."

Farber also rejected Doan's suggestion that Congress assists police in identifying breaches of the hate law. "We work independently," Farber said. "We don't call the police and say, 'Lay hate charges.' It's always done in public [news] releases."

Responding to questions from defence lawyer Peter Lindsay, Farber said he did not recall speaking to Dino Doria of the Hate Crimes Unit between August 1997 (when the demonstration occurred) and December 1997 (when the charges were laid), though they may have spoken about security issues concerning the High Holy Days. He said he was later contacted by Doria, who asked him to serve as an expert witness in the case.

Responding later to questions from Crown attorney Maggie Lazaridis, Farber said Harnick has addressed Congress meetings in the past, but made it very clear "he would not entertain any discussions on any cases, period."

Farber also testified that "more often than not, charges are not laid" in cases in which Congress believes a violation of the hate laws have occurred.

Contacted after court adjourned, Gomes said, "If any political pressure from any source played a part in the laying of charges, it's an avenue worth exploring."

He acknowledged such an exploration may "sting," but "it's relevant to see if Congress brought pressure on law enforcement for charges."

Keith Landy, chair of Congress' Ontario region, called that line of questioning "inappropriate and distasteful." He said some of the questions Farber faced suggested that "Harnick would do our bidding.

"I don't think they [Harnick and Bernstein] would use their religion to favor Congress, nor would Congress ask them to do so," he said.

Na'amat continues to evolve with new programs

TORONTO — Beautiful things come from caring. And Na'amat's Toronto membership proves that every day.

In 1996, the dream of Na'amat's Toronto members was realized with the opening of Tel Aviv's Glickman Centre for the Treatment and Prevention of Violence in the Family.

Na'amat has a long history of caring and improving the lives of women and children. Founded in 1921 to support women pioneers in Israel, its mission has expanded to encompass the support and advancement of women and their families in Israel and the 21 countries in which Na'amat works.

Na'amat is the largest women's movement in Israel, with 800,000 members. Its international arm, through organizations like Na'amat Canada, has an additional 100,000 members.

More than ever, Na'amat focuses not only on the needs of Israeli women and children, but also on Jewish women and children in Toronto, across Canada and around the world. In nine cities across Canada, it provides social, educational and cultural programs for its membership and helps support Na'amat's work in Israel.

In Toronto, Na'amat takes a leading role in advancing the status of women and their families. The local office offers Jewish women a Legal Advisory Clinic and a special Seniors Program for members and supporters.

Throughout the year, members organize a variety of fundraising activities to support Na'amat's mission, including an Annual Pleasures of the Palate Celebration, with the participation of 22 local restaurants, and the Annual Bazaar and Auction.

Starting in 1999, Na'amat Toronto will be organizing a School Supplies for Children project, which will canvas for school supplies to be donated to children at local domestic violence shelters.

With 1,500 facilities in Israel, Na'amat offers child care to 25,000 children daily, providing 60% of the country's day care; free legal services at over 30 legal aid offices to women facing financial or child custody problems, abusive husbands and those seeking a get; training for upper management positions to help close the 30% wage gap between men and women; health clinics; and helping over 5,000 women through counselling, support groups and rehabilitation programs for abusive husbands at Na'amat's five Domestic Violence Prevention Centres.

Na'amat Canada will be holding its triennial convention for the first time in Vancouver, with the theme "Na'amat meets the 21st century."

Last week, we began a series on the five political parties in the House of Commons. We will continue this series over the next couple of months.

This week, however, the focus is on Holocaust Remembrance.

An increasingly nasty dispute is brewing in the nation's capital and in the Prime Minister's Office, and a growing number of MPs are being drawn into the fray. The issue is the establishment of a Holocaust museum.

Two years ago, the issue pitted the Jewish community against Canadian war veterans who felt that dedicating space in the National War Museum for a Holocaust memorial was inappropriate.

Former defence minister Barney Danson was called in to defuse the situation, and it appeared that he had secured a solution satisfactory to all parties. However, the prime minister's recent trip to Poland sparked new tension, this time between Canadian Jewish Congress and other ethnic groups.

Jesse Flis, a Polish émigré to Canada and respected former member of parliament, led a campaign to have Polish representation in the Chrétien delegation. Some people perceive that the idea was vetoed by the Jewish delegation.

The "fight" then shifted to the idea of a Holocaust museum. An expanded ethnic coalition began to complain that the Holocaust does not represent the only example of 20th-century genocide and that other groups should have equal access to federal support. Although the idea does not sit well with the Jewish community, there is growing support for a genocide museum that would highlight other atrocities alongside the Holocaust.

This places the Jewish community in a precarious position. On the one hand, Canadian Jewish Congress maintains that the uniqueness of the Holocaust requires a dedicated memorial. On the other hand, the Jewish community once again finds itself isolated and defensive.

With neither side willing to back down, this situation has the potential to turn very ugly, very quickly unless a more creative alternative is developed that can allow everyone to save face. Word on the Hill is that the prime minister has no intention of arbitrating the dispute. Instead, he may well turn to the parties involved and insist that they resolve the issue themselves.

Given the history of inter-ethnic organizational relations over the last 20 years, no one should anticipate an early resolution.

Phony lawyer claims rabbinical law background

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — A Winnipeg man who is facing charges, including impersonating a lawyer, claimed that he received his legal training in a rabbinical school studying Jewish law.

Dean McDonald, also known as Simon Rothschild, is currently in police custody facing charges of practising law without a licence – as well as unrelated outstanding charges of impersonating an RCMP officer, and possession of cannabis for the purpose of trafficking.

According to Alan Fineblit, executive director of the Law Society of Manitoba, a man aroused the suspicions of Crown attorneys while he was acting as defence counsel in mid-March for two men charged in a sex-for-drugs case. The Crown attorneys approached Fineblit with their concerns.

"When they described the fellow, I realized that we had dealt with him before under a different name," says Fineblit. "I immediately went to court and raised the matter with the judge. Our major concern was that he had received particulars of the charges in a condition of trust. A couple of police officers were assigned to accompany him home to reclaim the materials. One of the officers recognized him as someone wanted on other charges."

According to Fineblit, a man first came to the attention of the Law Society about a year ago when a lawyer informed the society by letter that he had hired the man. Under a provision of the Law Society Act, Fineblit explains, a practising lawyer is allowed to hire students who are attending a law school.

'He said that he had read a lot of law books'

A routine society audit near the end of last year revealed that the man was not a law student, and he was told that he was no longer authorized to practise law.

"He protested, and insisted on a hearing before our admissions and education committee," Fineblit says. "He admitted that he had never attended law school, but insisted that he had been to rabbinical school in Toronto and New York, and had studied rabbinic law. He also said that he had read a lot of law books. The act is clear though. He was told that he couldn't practise. That was the last I heard of him until this."

Rabbi Avraham Altein, Winnipeg's Lubavitch rabbi, knows McDonald/Rothschild. He reports that McDonald/Rothschild has attended Chabad study classes.

"He used to live in Toronto," Rabbi Altein says. "He had a Jewish girlfriend there and used to attend synagogue. He wanted to become Jewish at one time. He is a nice guy and a very bright fellow."

Fineblit reports that the McDonald/Rothschild investigation is ongoing.

Agencies disagree over Egypt's military buildup

By DOUGLAS DAVIS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LONDON — Alarm bells are ringing in some quarters in Jerusalem over the buildup of the Egyptian army, which has more than doubled in size since the 1973 Yom Kippur War, according to sources in London.

The massive accumulation of weapons has also sparked an intense debate between two Israeli intelligence agencies about the threat posed by Egypt's bulging arsenals, say the sources.

Indeed, U.S. officials were reported to have been astonished when their Israeli counterparts placed Egypt ahead of Iran on the agenda of the recent U.S.- Israeli semi-annual strategic talks.

On one side of the debate in Jerusalem is Aman, Israel's military intelligence branch. Aman has reportedly warned of a possible deterioration in Israeli-Egyptian relations and the consequent significance of Cairo's arsenal for Israel's security.

Efficient fighting force

Military intelligence analysts are concerned that Egypt has not only become America's second-largest arms customer, after Saudi Arabia, but also that its army is now a modern, efficient fighting force, equipped with top-of-the-line American weaponry.

On the other side is the Mossad, Israel's foreign intelligence agency, which is reportedly trying to calm Aman's anxieties and portray Egyptian-Israeli relations as stable and secure.

The London sources say Egypt has more than doubled the size of the its armored corps, replacing outdated Soviet T-62s with modern American tanks, including the M1-A1. At the same time, the Egyptian Air Force now boasts more than 200 modern U.S.-made F-16 jet fighters.

Of even greater concern to Israel, which has only a small navy, is the fact that Egypt is now in the process of completely revamping its significantly larger naval fleet.

Aman and the Mossad disagree on the extent to which Egypt poses a real short-term threat to Israel.

Despite the two countries' 20-year-old peace treaty, Aman contends that the peace is fragile and that almost any crisis, including a confrontation between Israel and the Palestinian Authority, could trigger a resumption of hostilities between the two countries.

As a result of this perception, the Israeli army routinely includes the possibility of Egyptian "intervention" in most of its war games.

The Mossad reportedly takes a more sanguine view, contending that Cairo's peace with Israel, however cool, forms the strategic underpinning of Egypt's Middle East vision.

Nothing short of a direct Israeli attack on Cairo, or an outright massacre of Palestinians in the West Bank and Gaza, they say, could cause Egypt to change course and engage Israel in a new war.

Mossad officers also say that Israeli lobbying on Capitol Hill against the arming of Egypt is regarded in Cairo as a hostile move.

The Mossad is also said to be concerned that Aman's position could cause the Israeli leadership to miscalculate during a moment of crisis and overreact to Egyptian tactical moves.

Indeed, Mossad officials are said to be concerned that Aman's projections may turn out to be a self-fulfilling prophecy, especially since Aman is currently considered the "national assessor" of strategic threats to Israel and has the ear of Israeli leaders.

Israel's population passes 6M

By MOTI BASSOK
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israel's population rose 2.3 percent last year, reaching an all-time high of 6.038 million, according to the 1998 data published last Sunday by the Central Bureau of Statistics.

Jerusalem retained its status as the nation's most populous city, having grown by1.7 percent to 632,000 residents.

Tel Aviv had 350,000 residents in 1998, a 0.4-percent gain. The population of Haifa, the nation's third largest city, stands at 265,000, an increase of just 0.2 percent over the year.

The overall rate of population growth slowed last year, as the influx of new immigrants waned somewhat.

The Central District – the nation's largest – grew by 3.6 percent last year, reaching 1.355 million residents. The cities of Lod, Modi'in, Shoham and Rishon Letzion accounted for much of the growth.

The population of the Jewish settlements in the West Bank and Gaza Strip grew by seven percent last year, after increasing nine percent in 1997 and 9.4 percent in 1996. The settlements added about 11,000 residents last year, bringing the total to 172,000.

The proportion of the population living in the nation's large cities – those with at least 100,000 residents – is continuing to drop at the rate of half a percentage point a year, falling to 43.5 percent at the end of last year.

Of the cities with predominantly Jewish populations, only three showed greater growth last year than the national average: Ashdod and Rishon Letzion, which gained about five percent each, and Petach Tikvah, which gained 2.5 percent.

Rishon Letzion is now the fourth largest city in Israel, with 187,000 residents. Number five is Beersheva, with 164,000.

Cities with primarily non-Jewish populations grew faster than the national average, with the largest – Nazareth – gaining 2.8 percent to end the year at 57,000.

Abdullah puts priority on ties with Arab countries

By DOUGLAS DAVIS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LONDON — Jordan's King Abdullah pledged that he would never pursue relations with Israel "at the expense" of relations with fellow Arab countries, including Iraq, Syria and Egypt; nor with the Palestinian self-rule government.

"With the new reign, we are opening a clean sheet with everyone, based on mutual respect," Abdullah told the London-based Arab language newspaper Al-Quds al-Arabi, in a recent interview.

"Jordan is Arab first and last and cannot shed its skin," said the new king.

He also said Jordan would throw its full support behind the Palestinians during final-status negotiations with Israel.

In an apparent reference to Israel, he told the paper that he had promised Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat "not to allow any third party to come between us or try to play on any contradictions that may arise."

Abdullah also said he and Arafat had pledged "to remain in direct contact, in order to consult on all matters, big or small, and clear up any misunderstandings that may arise."

He insisted that Jordan would not be "dragged" into taking a direct role in the Israeli-Palestinian final-status negotiations and would "resist all pressure that may be exerted on it in that regard."

Jordanian officials are reportedly concerned that Israel would insist the Hashemite kingdom become directly involved in the final-status talks, and that the Jewish state would make a permanent settlement with the Palestinians contingent on security guarantees from Jordan.

But Abdullah stressed that Israel must negotiate "with the party concerned, namely the Palestinian party."

He was more guarded when asked about claims made by Arafat shortly after the February death of King Hussein, that an agreement had been struck to establish a Jordanian-Palestinian confederation.

"Our doors are open to any possible formula for cooperation with the Palestinians," Abdullah said, "but only after the establishment of an independent Palestinian state and the conclusion of the final-status negotiations."

Abdullah, who is thought to have embarked on a campaign to burnish his Arab credentials, said that following his visit to Saudi Arabia this month, he is planning official visits to other countries in the Arab world, including Syria, Libya and the Persian Gulf states.

He told the paper that Jordan's relations with Egypt were developing well and that he had established a good personal relationship with President Hosni Mubarak when they met last month.

According to the paper, Abdullah made no secret of his admiration for Bashar Assad, son and heir-apparent of Syrian President Hafez al-Assad, praising his vision of Syria's future as "forward-looking, modern and aware of the political and strategic changes currently sweeping the world."

Abdullah also said he is adopting a more moderate approach to Iraq than his late father, who had sought to atone for his perceived support of Iraq during the 1991 Gulf War by embracing a robustly pro-western antipathy toward Iraq.

"What concerns us in Jordan is to have a united and stable Iraq whose people are not suffering," he said, noting that Jordan "will not be a launch pad for any hostile action against Iraq."

Referring to Jordan's own economic problems, Abdullah said the "coming six months will be extremely decisive." During this period, he said, "priority will be given to the economy and to providing job opportunities and meeting the needs of citizens."

He played down suggestions that his rapprochement with Saudi Arabia was designed to restore aid from the Gulf states, severed over Hussein's ambiguous role in the Gulf War.

Acknowledging that the Arab oil-producing states are having financial difficulties of their own, Abdullah said he had not asked the Gulf states for "aid or financial grants.

Abdullah said he was also hoping for "improved economic cooperation" with the West, particularly over the question of debt relief, which he said would help Jordan overcome its current economic crisis.

No anti-Semitism in charges, Russian Jewish leaders say

By LEV KRICHEVSKY
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

MOSCOW — A decision by Russian prosecutors to order the arrest of two business tycoons with Jewish roots does not signify a return to state-sponsored anti-Semitism, say Russian Jewish leaders.

But the leaders are nonetheless concerned that the arrest warrants are reminiscent of Soviet-era political persecutions.

The concerns were voiced after the Russian Prosecutor General's Office issued separate warrants for the arrest of businessman-turned-politician Boris Berezovsky and banker Alexander Smolensky, neither of whom consider themselves Jewish or involved in Jewish life.

Prosecutors said Berezovsky is wanted on charges of "illegal entrepreneurship" and money laundering. Berezovsky, considered one of the wealthiest men in the world, began his business empire by setting up Russia's first capitalist car dealerships some 10 years ago.

Indeed, the arrest order was cancelled after Berezovsky agreed to return to Russia to face money-laundering charges.

He later built up a vast network of holdings that reportedly included large stakes in the oil and media industries and in airlines.

Smolensky, the head of SBS-Agro, one of Russia's largest banks, is wanted on suspicion of misappropriation of funds.

Smolensky is currently in Austria – he holds an Austrian passport in addition to his Russian one.

Few people in Russia are shedding tears for the two men.

Politicians across the political spectrum have been unanimous in their dislike for Berezovsky, Smolensky and some of the other so-called oligarchs, a group of businessmen who helped to bankroll President Boris Yeltsin's come-from-behind re-election in 1996 in exchange for political influence and large chunks of privatized state property.

After Yeltsin's re-election, Berezovsky briefly held a post in the Kremlin as deputy secretary of Russia's advisory Security Council.

Both men, as well as the other oligarchs, have seen their influence wane since the collapse of the Russian economy last August and the subsequent appointment of Yevgeny Primakov as the country's prime minister.

Still, even some of the oligarchs' political foes criticized the move.

Moscow Mayor Yuri Luzhkov, a longtime foe of Berezovsky, condemned the arrest orders as political persecution. Luzhkov also warned against a possible return to Stalinist-era repression.

Berezovsky's lawyer, Henry Reznik, agreed.

"We are talking about persecuting political opponents," Reznik said. "Berezovsky is dangerous to the Communists and those dreaming about the restoration of a bureaucratic Communist regime."

In the eyes of many Russians, the oligarchs are a symbol of Jewish prominence in contemporary Russia and as a result, are the target of anti-Semitic attacks.

Smolensky who was raised as a Jew, considers himself a member of Russia's Orthodox Church. Berezovsky also reportedly converted to Christianity, but he has never hid his Jewish origins and has often spoken out on the problem of anti-Semitism. He even became an Israeli citizen in 1994, but later gave it up.

At a recent news conference in Paris, Berezovsky said he was not a victim of anti-Semites or Communists. He insisted his persecution was part of the fight for control over the mass media in which he is a major player.

Jewish leaders say they do not think the arrest orders are connected to the ongoing surge in anti-Semitism that began last summer, when Russia's financial crisis started.

But Moscow Chief Rabbi Pinchas Goldschmidt said he regretted that anti-Semites generally link people such as Berezovsky or Smolensky to the Jewish community.

Another Jewish official, Mikhail Chlenov, president of the Va'ad, the Russian Jewish Federation, said he is concerned over the effects of the orders on the already chaotic Russian political scene.

"Such campaigns are a natural cause for Jewish concern," he said.

The Week in Israel

April 12

• Sgt. Noam Barnea, 21, was killed by a Hezbollah roadside bomb.

April 13

• Israelis stood in silence as sirens sounded in memory of the six million Jews murdered during the Holocaust.

• The spiritual leader of the Shas party was hospitalized after suffering a mild heart attack. Rabbi Ovadia Yosef, 78, was listed in stable condition at Hadassah Hospital in Jerusalem.

April 14

• Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu promised to continue settlement activities during a campaign address. The vow came two days after visiting U.S. envoy Martin Indyk criticized Israeli settlement construction as possibly hampering the peace process.

• Police said they arrested four Palestinians in connection with the May 1997 kidnapping and killing of an Arab man who sold land in Jerusalem to Jews. Police said the four told interrogators that senior Palestinian officials had ordered the shooting death of Ali Mohammed Jumhour.

April 15

• The Jewish National Fund dedicated a memorial for Holocaust survivors killed in Israel's War of Independence near Latrun, where many of them died soon after disembarking from the boats that brought them to Israel.

• Aryeh Deri, leader of the Shas party was sentenced to four years in prison and fined NIS 250,000 for taking $155,000 (US) in bribes. Deri said he would appeal the sentence.

• According to the Bank of Israel, foreign investment in Israel in 1998 reached an all-time high of some $74.5 billion (US).

April 16

• Media reported that the IDF and SLA forces entered the village of Arnoun in south Lebanon. Tension has increased in the area since the death, earlier in the week, of IDF officer, Sgt. Noam Barnea.

Dispute in Nazareth

Earlier in the month, the dispute turned violent. At least seven people were injured during confrontations between Christians and Muslims that coincided with the Easter holiday.

Israeli riot police were called in as youths from each side threatened to escalate the violence.

"It was shocking," said one Israeli police official. "Muslim youths attacked every vehicle whose driver they believed to be Christian.

"It was a real intifadah," he added, referring to the 1987-1993 Palestinian uprising against Israel. The violence immediately sparked warnings about the millennium festivities.

Officials in Nazareth and in the Israeli government have already invested millions of dollars in development projects – including the renewal of the ancient market, paving new roads and rehabilitating old buildings – in preparation for the influx of tourists expected to arrive from all over the world to mark the millennium.

But as things stand now, even the regular stream of tourists, mostly Israelis who visit the town on weekends, has dwindled.

Ami Ayalon, head of the Shin Bet domestic security service, has warned that the controversy could spill over to other Arab population centres in Israel.

Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat sent emissaries who tried, unsuccessfully, to mediate the dispute.

Unable to reach an agreement among themselves, Christians and Muslims in Nazareth tossed the ball into the hands of the Israeli government.

Jeraisi said it was only fitting that Israel intervene because the land in dispute is state land, and it is up to Israel to decide how it should be used.

Islamic politicians countered that the land is under the control of the Wakf, the Muslim body responsible for overseeing Islamic holy sites.

At first, Israeli Interior Minister Eli Suissa threw his support behind the Islamic cause – a move that drew a sharp reaction from the Christian world.

Senior church delegates, among them the Latin Patriarch, Michel Sabah, and the custodian of holy sites on behalf of the Vatican, Giovanni Batistelli, wrote a sharply worded letter to Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu warning that "whoever gives in to extortionists today will give in to terrorism tomorrow."

The church leaders also warned that the Pope would cancel his trip to the Holy Land if Israel sided with the Islamic side.

Last week, the director general of Israel's Religious Affairs Ministry, Avi Blustein, was fired after he claimed that Christian representatives threatened to shut down their churches for the millennium year if the mosque was built near the Church of the Annunciation.

A church representative said Blustein's claim was an attempt by Israel to dodge its own responsibility for the conflict.

On Sunday, an Israeli ministerial committee reached a decision in the controversy, allowing Nazareth's Muslim community to build the mosque – provided they removed the protest tent they had erected at the site.

Salman Abu-Ahmad, an Islamic leader in Nazareth, rejected the decision.

"The decision is not serious," he told JTA. "It does not meet our minimum demands."

Iranian Jews arrested

By JULIA GOLDMAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — Twelve Iranian Jews were arrested in Iran last month, but the specific charges remain unclear, according to sources familiar with the situation.

The arrests stem from an internal dispute between the Jewish communities of Tehran and Shiraz, in southwest Iran, according to the sources, with the Iranian authorities stepping in on the side of the Tehran community.

Malcolm Hoenlein, the executive vice-chair of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations, said he was in regular contact with people directly involved with the Iranian Jewish community, and that efforts are underway to resolve the situation as soon as possible. Another source said he hoped the dispute could be resolved internally.

The Conference of Presidents is an umbrella organization of 55 Jewish groups, which represents communal concerns with the U.S. administration.

A widely distributed alert circulating on the Internet said that 23 Jews, including three rabbis, had been arrested for "teaching and learning Torah."

Hoenlein and other sources said the report was "exaggerated."

Contrary to the cyber-rumors, Hoenlein said none of the Jews arrested were facing execution.

The United States government is aware of the situation, he said, but not involved in any negotiations.

Some 8,000 Jews lived in Shiraz on the eve of the 1979 Iranian revolution, but today's Jewish population there is difficult to assess.

The American Jewish Year Book puts Iran's total Jewish population at 12,500; other estimates have put the current number as high as 35,000.

Israel Election Notebook
May 17

By DAVID LANDAU
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

Israeli Foreign Minister Ariel Sharon is flirting with Russia, with the seeming acquiescence of Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu – and to the mounting chagrin of the United States.

Sharon's recent visit to Moscow comes as the United States and its NATO allies are continuing their campaign against Russia's traditional ally, Serbia.

The visit has critics charging that America's own intimate ally, Israel, has turned its back on Washington at a time of war.

Those mystified by Sharon's Moscow trip got a hint of what was taking place when he acknowledged to an American reporter the truth behind the rampant suspicions in Israel, that this policy departure on Russia is linked to the imminent Israeli elections.

The former general, who in 1973 was instrumental in founding the Likud bloc, told the New York Times in an interview that he believed Likud could win the Israeli election next month if just three percent more of the immigrant community from the former Soviet Union would vote for its prime ministerial candidate, Benjamin Netanyahu.

Indeed, many of these immigrants would be pleased at the sight of a warming relationship between their new country and their former Russian homeland, for which they still harbor emotional, and in some cases, business ties.

The first hint that something was afoot came last month, when, with NATO troops in action against the Serbs, Israel among all western nations remained curiously reticent in its expressions of solidarity with its patron and friend, the United States.

Netanyahu eventually made the requisite statements of support – but only after eyebrows had been raised at home and in Washington over his obvious reluctance to speak out in favor of the NATO strikes in Yugoslavia.

But Sharon left people on both sides of the Atlantic gasping when he not only failed to side with America, but actually criticized the NATO operation.

He hinted that the Kosovar Muslims were linked to nations and organizations hostile to Israel.

He also focused on Holocaust-era memories of Balkan collaboration with the Nazis – when the Serbs stood out for their brave resistance to the Germans.

He spoke of the dangers of a Kosovar state becoming a hotbed of Islamic terrorism that could rattle Europe for years to come.

He spoke of the dangerous precedent – for Israel – of outside powers intervening by force in the internal affairs of a sovereign state, when a part of its populace raises separatist demands.

And he spoke, too, of the need for Israel to improve its ties with the Serbs' longtime friend – Russia.

Further upsetting his critics, Sharon's comments, and subsequent visit, come at a time when Russia has been experiencing increased anti-Semitism, much of it prompted by the nation's ongoing economic crisis.

Observers who failed to notice that something new and unusual might be happening in the corridors of power in Jerusalem, got another clue when Netanyahu appeared to suggest to a visiting U.S. congressional delegation that the policy of economic sanctions against Russian firms, a means of curbing its supply of nuclear technology to Iran, might be replaced by an incentive-based approach.

The prime minister's aides later vigorously denied that Netanyahu had urged a six-month moratorium on sanctions. Benjamin Gilman, chair of the house international relations committee, endorsed the denials.

But to some observers, something seemed suspicious, and corroboration was not long in coming.

In Washington, U.S. officials vented their anger when they realized that their Israeli guest – Sharon – was planning to fly from the U.S. capital to Moscow.

This came on the same weekend that Russian President Boris Yeltsin's aides were busily denying their leader's apparent threat to retarget Russia's nuclear missiles at the NATO countries.

U.S. officials, for their part, denied Sharon's claims that his visit to Russia, and his overtures to the Kremlin, were all co-ordinated with Washington.

The same denial, in even blunter terms, was delivered by the U.S. assistant secretary of state for Near Eastern affairs, Martin Indyk, visiting Israel as the head of a team of U.S. officials for joint strategic talks with the Israelis.

Along with voicing their anger over Sharon's visit, U.S. officials also criticized Israeli settlement activity.

U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright, meeting with Sharon, urged Israel to refrain from expanding settlements.

And Indyk, during a meeting with Netanyahu, also criticized Israeli settlement activity, reiterating American concerns that it could hamper peace efforts with the Palestinians.

Meanwhile, there was a report that Sharon's Moscow visit had an added dimension.

The veteran defence editor of the Israeli daily Ha'aretz, Ze'ev Schiff, reported that Sharon was proposing to the Russians that they mediate a deal between Israel and Syria for the immediate withdrawal — before the elections – of Israeli troops from southern Lebanon.

Underscoring the potential electoral appeal of such a dramatic move, yet another Israeli soldier was killed in southern Lebanon by a Hezbollah roadside bomb.

Sgt. Noam Barnea, 21, was buried at a military cemetery.

Israel's security cabinet met in Jerusalem to discuss the nation's options in the face of mounting military casualties in southern Lebanon. Some Israeli media reported that Israel is starting to reduce its troop presence in Lebanon to reduce casualties.

All this came just as Sharon was reportedly making his case about Lebanon to Prime Minister Yevgeny Primakov and other top policymakers in Moscow.

Sharon, who had stated he was visiting Moscow to press Russian officials to block the flow of weapons technology to Iran, denied the Ha'aretz report.

The stakes, then, are no longer merely three percent of Israel's Russian immigrant vote.

They also involve a deal on Lebanon that could be an election winner for Likud.

At the same time, however, the repercussions for Israel's friendship with the United States and for its overall strategic standing could be far-reaching indeed.

On election stump, Sharon courts Russia to chagrin of U.S.

Canadians fought for Israel's independence

By
YEDIDIA 'EDDY' KAPLANSKY
Special to The CJN

In the autumn of 1947, Montreal's Sydney Shulemson, a former RCAF pilot and Canada's most highly decorated Jewish serviceman of World War II, travelled to New York to participate in a meeting of a covert committee of influential Americans headed by Jewish philanthropist Rudolph Sonneborn.

The Sonneborn Institute, as they dubbed themselves, backed the Haganah throughout Israel's pre-state and nascent period, both practically and financially, in the recruitment of volunteers and procurement of military equipment.

Shulemson's participation in that meeting led to the formation of a similar covert group in Montreal soon after the UN General Assembly's adoption of the Partition Plan for Palestine on November 29, 1947. At about the same time, other like-minded groups sprung up in Canada's major cities. The one in Toronto was initiated by Ben Dunkelman, a highly decorated ex-army officer of World War II renown.

The efforts of the loosely connected committees, co-ordinated mainly through the Haganah office in New York, resulted in the active participation of many young Canadians in Israel's War of Independence. Perhaps because of the secrecy involved in recruitment of the volunteers, there was no fanfare or publicity when those who returned came home. To this day, their very existence has not been formally acknowledged by any national organization representative of Canadian Jewry.

Small wonder that few people, except friends and relatives, knew much about the Canadian volunteers before the publication in 1983 of David Bercuson's very revealing book, The Secret Army.

A most appropriate occasion for Canadian Jewry to have at long last paid tribute to their volunteers who put their lives very much on the line in 1948 for the Jewish state's creation, would have been their 1998 celebrations of Israel's 50th Jubilee. It is difficult to understand why such a tribute, which should rightly have been central to the Canada-wide celebrations, did not take place. Perhaps the idea simply never occurred to the decision-makers.

Whatever the reason, its likely consequence is that the volunteers themselves will never see their formal acknowledgment by Canadian Jewry, as time is quickly running out for them.

I am aware of only two such tributes last year, organized separately at the local level in Montreal and Toronto. Only the one in Montreal was exclusively for the 1948 volunteers, and of course both focused primarily on local veterans.

Israel's 1948 overseas volunteers were known as Machal, the Hebrew acronym for volunteers from abroad. About 3,500 in all, they came from 37 different countries and every continent, and included a considerable number of non-Jews. The 119 Machalniks killed or missing in the war came from 29 different countries, and included four women and nine non-Jews. The eleven from Canada who were killed or missing included three non-Jews.

Machal men and women served with distinction in all branches of the IDF on land, at sea and in the air, without rank and mostly poorly equipped. Their contribution proved particularly important in the formation and efficient operation of the air force, armored corps, medical corps and artillery.

Of the 235 or so Canadians, some 61 percent were veterans of World War II, among them a

FIRST CALL

This year, on the eve of the Holocaust Martyrs and Heroes Remembrance Day, Yad Vashem will launch a broad-based comprehensive campaign to collect the names of Holocaust victims.

For over 43 years, Yad Vashem has been collecting testimonies of survivors in Israel and throughout the world. Survivors' testimonies are a foremost source of information in the documentation of the names of those who perished in the Holocaust. These testimonies are sometimes the only perpetuation of the victims' names. Relatives and loved ones complete pages of testimony with the victims' personal details, including last place of residence, profession, place and circumstances of their death. Occasionally, a picture of the victim is attached to the form. The pages of testimony are preserved in the Hall of Names at Yad Vashem.

Until now, 53 years after the end of World War II, some three million names of Holocaust victims have been collected in the Hall of Names at Yad Vashem. As the twentieth century draws to a close and the generation of survivors grows older, this may be the last opportunity for the Jewish people in Israel and the Diaspora to provide a name and memory for each of the six million people who were murdered simply because they were Jews. A census of the Jewish people will be initiated and conducted in order to collect the still unknown names of those who perished in the Holocaust.

Yad Vashem will again appeal, in Israel and in the Diaspora, to the relatives and loved ones of those who were murdered in the Holocaust, to complete pages of testimony. At a later stage, the pages of testimony will be scanned and entered into the international central data base of victims' names in the Hall of Names at Yad Vashem.

At the launching of the campaign at Yad Vashem, the President and the Prime Minister of the State of Israel will call upon the Jewish people to heed this appeal and fill out pages of testimony.

The Canadian Society along with the American & British Societies have been asked to be a part of this very exciting and critically important project. In Israel the Campaign will be launched on the eve of Yom Hashoah Monday, April 12, 1999, and will continue until the end of the century in Israel and among Jewish Communities worldwide.

Please take this opportunity to fill in this page of testimony and to obtain more pages or for further information contact the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem at 416-785-1333 or 1-888-494-7999 or e-mail ydvashem@istar.ca number of non-Jews. It should be noted that of the 20 World War II-trained pilots from Canada in the Israel Air Force (IAF) during the 1948 war, an overwhelming 75 percent were non-Jews.

About 240 of the overseas volunteers served on the Aliya-Bet (clandestine immigration) ships whose importance to the pre-state struggle for independence is not widely known. While most were from the United States, the number includes 15 from Canada.

The above statistics derive from research in the late 1980s and 1990s, some of which I conducted.

The identity of virtually every Canadian Machalnik, plus other relevant facts and statistics, can be found in my interim research paper on the subject published last year in The Canadian Jewish News jubilee tribute to Israel. That paper, plus another on IAF fliers in the War of Independence, are readily available at Canadian Jewish Congress National Archives and at other appropriate repositories.

It angers and saddens me therefore, that erroneous Machal "facts" continue to appear. A case in point is Voices From The Heart, which was published last year.

The book's primary purpose was to commemorate the greater Toronto Jewish community's ties to Israel. It achieved this purpose well. But it also attempted to pay tribute to Machal. Unfortunately, some of what appeared was incorrect.

In one article, entitled Who Were the Mahal?, the number 3,000 is given as the Machal total including "the largest contingent, an estimated 1,500" from South Africa and "probably 400" from Canada.

The fact is that the largest contingent, an estimated 1,100, came from the United States, but on a Jewish per capita basis, the contingents of most, if not all of the other countries, including Canada, were larger than the American one. On a per capita basis, the South Africans greatly outnumbered every other country. In actual numbers, they were second to the contingent from the United States.

It is noteworthy too, that of the major Jewish communities worldwide, only South Africa's has shown consistent and unstinting pride in its 1948 Machalniks. In the early 1970s, the South African Zionist Federation even commissioned a book in their honor. Although the book is called South Africa's 800, a count of their names reveals that there were 678 Machalniks from that country. The apparent discrepancy between the two numbers is covered by the 129 South Africans who had by then settled in Israel on kibbutzim.

Voices From The Heart asserts that there were only 40 non-Jews in Machal ranks, and that the IAF was "at first 95 percent Machal." The fact is, however, that throughout the entire war the extent of Machal participation in the IAF never exceeded 76.6 percent.

The number of non-Jewish volunteer fliers in the IAF was 91, of whom 16 were from Canada. In addition, an undetermined number of non-Jews were in IAF ground jobs and in the ground and naval forces.

Voices from the Heart also included two people, Len Fine and Marjory Ziff among the list of Canadians who were killed or missing. Both survived.

But perhaps the most regrettable of the book's Machal errors, is its failure to mention the six young Torontonians who lost their lives. Lest they be forgotten, they were: the cousins Ed Lugech and Harvey Cohen, Reuben 'Red' Schiff, Sidney Rubinoff, Sidney Leisure and Wilf Canter. Three of them were barely 19 years old; the rest were not much older.

The dissemination of such misinformation about Machal is, of course, never intentional. But it does indicate a disregard for historical accuracy, the unfortunate result of which is that the truth is forever lost to posterity.

The author lives in Haifa.

Amniocentesis said safer than blood tests

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Women over 35 years old, who are pregnant with their first child, face an additional risk if they opt for a blood test at 12 weeks of pregnancy, instead of waiting for an amniocentesis at 16 weeks, says a staff physician at Mount Sinai Hospital

The risk is six percent higher than the risk of an amniocentesis, which can result in a miscarriage once in 200 cases, Dr. June Carroll told an audience at Leah Posluns Theatre recently.

The earlier blood test, known as CVS, involves taking blood from the placenta, Carroll said. During amniocentesis, cells are taken from the amniotic sac surrounding the baby.

One-third of babies with Down syndrome are born to women more than 35 years old, Carroll said.

She and three other geneticists taking part in a Healthy Living forum, advised families to share information openly about hereditary diseases.

They said that accurate information is needed about when the disease first showed up and what specific areas it affected. Both sides of the family need to be queried.

Some life insurance companies in Canada discriminate against people who are at risk of having a hereditary disease, said Dr. Wendy Meschino, a clinical geneticist at North York General Hospital and a consultant to the Ministry of Health.

"In the course of predictive testing, we sometimes advise people to check their insurance policies first, and then come back if they are satisfied there is no discrimination in the policies. On the other hand, some people decide not to be tested."

Though many people fear that they will develop cancer if a parent has the disease, Meschino said only five to 10 percent of cancers are hereditary.

About 65 percent of pregnant women in Toronto opt to have a blood test under a maternal genetic screening program, Carroll said. In six out of 100 cases, an unusual risk of hereditary disease is shown, and this can be confirmed, positively or negatively, at 16 weeks when an amniocentesis is taken.

Neural tube defects in babies, (spina bifida) can be prevented if the mother takes 0.4 mg. of folic acid daily during the early weeks of pregnancy, she said.

Genetic screening is a complicated matter, said Carroll, because it brings up the question of abortion as an option. For this reason, a lot of couples do not want the tests, she said.

The risk of developing Tay-Sachs disease, which affects Ashkenazi Jews, is four per 1,000 births.

Dr. Diane Kelsall, a Mount Sinai Hopsital staff physician, said that genetic counselling saved the life of someone in her family who had malignant hypothermia, a hereditary disease. The rare disease can be prevented by proper introduction of an anesthetic, she said.

Kelsall delighted the audience with pictures of her large family group sharing information about their health history. "Family members should talk to each other and to their family doctor," she said.

In her case, blood tests were taken at a family picnic, but she didn't think this was necessary in most instances.

Dr. Sean Blaine, a Stratford physician, gave an overview of the current state of genetic counselling.

The program was co-presented by Mount Sinai Hospital, Jewish Women's Federation and the Bathurst Jewish Centre, and sponsored by Imperial Oil Charitable Foundation. It was chaired by Carol Seidman of Mount Sinai Hospital.

NYGH gets ready to expand its emergency department

TORONTO — North York General Hospital has received approval from the minister of health to more than double the size of its emergency department.

The government will fund $2.2 million of the $4.3-million project, with the balance coming from the community.

"We are delighted that the government has fast-tracked the emergency department expansion so we can move ahead quickly to better serve our community," said hospital president and CEO Murray MacKenzie. "With this announcement, we can begin construction on the first phase of the project early this summer and complete 5,000 square feet of new space within nine months. Renovations will continue over the next three years as the Leslie site redevelopment project progresses."

North York General Hospital is one of the busiest emergency centres in the province, with close to 60,000 patients treated last year. The number of patients is expected to grow to 75,000 or 85,000 after hospital restructuring is implemented.

In order to accommodate the increased caseload, the emergency department will expand from 9,000 square feet to over 22,000 square feet.

"A group of physicians and nurses have been working together for months to plan the new, state-of-the-art department," said Dr. Tim Rutledge, chief of emergency services. "We're all very excited about the impact it will have on the quality of care we provide and the work environment for staff.

"After the congestion and overcrowding of the last few years, there's no question that more space will vastly improve the level of care for patients. There will be more cubicles which means greater privacy and dignity for patients and families. We will create special areas where we can concentrate care and resources on certain types of patients such as children, those with heart attacks and strokes, and so on," he said.

The emergency department expansion is one part of the redevelopment of North York General Hospital, including expansion of the Leslie site, conversion of the Branson site to an ambulatory care centre, and expansion of long-term care services at the Seniors' Health Centre and other locations.

Actor enjoying director's dream

Will stage light comedy

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

Helen Kessler directs Squabbles at Holy Blossom Temple.

Helen Kessler, a former actor with the Holy Blossom Temple Stagecraft Company, is enjoying a director's dream.

For her first play as a director, she has chosen one she personally picked out after reading a slew of plays dealing with family relations.

"This is my choice and I believe in it," she told The CJN.

The play, Squabbles, has never been done in Canada and, as far as Kessler knows, has never been on Broadway, but has been staged twice in the United States.

"But I think it is a wonderful comedy, and I want to direct it so that people can laugh till their sides ache."

Deliberately seeking out a play which is not thought provoking or issue-oriented, Kessler said Squabbles is not in the Stagecraft Company's tradition. But she is so sure that it will hit the funnybone of Canadian Jewish families that the company is hoping to remount it at the Skylight Theatre in Earl Bales Park, or the Ford Studio Theatre this summer when its run at Holy Blossom is over.

Squabbles, by the American playwright Marshall Karp, is set in present-day Connecticut, and deals with a young married couple whose parents move in with them. From then on it's a scenario that, according to Kessler, anyone from age 5 to 95 will appreciate as coming close to home.

Kessler, who has appeared as an actor in Body of Water, Shmulnik's Waltz and The Tenth Man for the Stagecraft Company , said her chief problem in directing Squabbles is that even the actors are laughing at the lines. But she is sure this will clear up by opening night.

Leading the seven-member cast are Gerry Babins, Judy Malkin, Eric Kirsh and Ana Grossman, with supporting help from Susanne Egier, Abe Neufeld and Ellen Karabanow.

Squabbles is being staged at Holy Blossom Temple April 29, May 1 and 2. Curtain time is 7:30 p.m. Tickets are $10 in advance and $12 at the door, with students and seniors at half price on Thursday and Sunday. Proceeds from refreshments sold at intermission, and before and after the play will help finance the Temple's Out of the Cold program.

A patron's ticket at $50 offers reserved seating and a tax receipt for the maximum allowed. For tickets and information call 789-3291, ext. 511.

Dorothy Parker brings her martini back to Toronto.

A COMIC-DRAMATIC TAKE ON THE 20th CENTURY

Montreal-based theatre director, instructor and playwright Anna Fuerstenberg has taken years to develop Saidye, a 120-year-old comic-dramatic character who looks back on the 20th century from the year 2050, having survived a future apocalypse.

Saidye is based on "an amalgam of my aunts, none of which were actually related to me," says Fuerstenberg, who explains that her family, after surviving the Holocaust, acquired many honorary relatives in Canada. Fuerstenberg was born after the war's end in a refugee camp in Stuttgart.

"Because we had no family, we just adopted everybody," she says. "These women – I'm including my mother among them – were survivors and they had the most positive, light-filled lives. They survived everything and they had this glow about them, and they interpreted things with great spirit and joy. These women needed to be heard."

Fuerstenberg found that audiences would always react positively to Saidye's Yiddish-inflected malapropisms and her irreverent takes on the century's malaise and joys. After playing the character on numerous radio shows and comedy festivals, she built up a full show, which she performed to great acclaim last year in Nashville.

She performs the show, Saidye's Millenium, with only herself and a klezmer fiddler on stage, May 2 and 3, 8:30 p.m., at the Tarragon Extra Space, 30 Bridgeman St.

Incidentally, Fuerstenberg comes from a highly talented family. Her brother is Adam Fuerstenberg, a professor of literature at Ryerson and editor of Parchment, the annual journal of contemporary Canadian Jewish writing.

Notable authors grace lineup of Bloor JCC literary series

CJN Staff

TORONTO — The coffee flowed and the bagels were piled high at the Bloor Jewish Community Centre's (JCC) Wallin lounge where the book From Memory to Transformation: Jewish Women's Voices, was the focus of Books and Bagels, the JCC's literary series.

Some 75 people – mainly women – listened intently to three women give readings.

Journalist and NOW magazine entertainment editor Susan Cole, and women's studies professor Greta Hofmann Nemiroff, both contributed to Memory and Transformation, edited by Margie Wolfe and Sarah Silberstein Swartz.

Silberstein Swartz' daughter Hannah Swartz, read for her mother who had to cancel at the last minute for personal reasons. Wolfe, of Second Story Press, introduced all the readers.

Books and Bagels, the brainchild of Frances Enchin, is run through the JCC's cultural arts program. Now in its fifth year, the series has had many notables giving readings, among them playwright Jason Sherman, novelist Morley Torgov and Globe and Mail columnist Rick Salutin.

Enchin, who was on the JCC's program committee in 1994, said she wanted to start a reading series because while there was a book fair in the fall there was no ongoing Jewish reading series.

"There was concern about whether we would be able to build a program throughout the year, which has proved to be no problem, Enchin said.

The first program was with Torgov. "We did it by the seat of our pants. I was terrified nobody would show up. But there were about 20 people."

"We 've had very little trouble getting readers. We called up people who we thought would be interesting and most people were eager to do it.

"Writing is a lonely profession and I think most writers welcome the opportunity to read. Now people often call us."

Enchin said she likes to have a variety of people, known and unknown, to read. "It's important to present people whose work has not got a lot of attention.

"When you see a lesser known person being discovered by an audience, that's what I find special."

The program, which is very informal, attracts people of all ages, depending on the writer; a lot people are from the JCC, she said. "There's a following."

On May 2 poet Libby Scheier will be reading from her new book Kaddish for my Father: New and Selected Poems 1970-1998 and poet Malca Litovitz will also be reading. The Sunday morning series is held in Wallin Lounge at 11 a.m.

The series will end on May 16 with Harold Troper who will be reading from his new book, The Ransomed of God: the Remarkable Story of One Woman's Role in the Rescue of Syrian Jews.

Jewish Film Festival to kick off on April 29

Sheldon Kirshner reviews five of the movies to be screened at the seventh annual Toronto Jewish Film Festival, running at the Cineplex Odeon Hyland theatre from April 29 to May 6.

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

It is a truism that Jews are found in the unlikeliest of places. Mississippi's delta, a hotbed of segregation prior to the dawn of the civil rights era, is one of them. In Delta Jews (May 5 at 4:30 p.m.), a fine, informative documentary, Mike De Witt explores Jewish life in that remote, ethnocentric corner of the United States.

Being white but not Christian, Jews enjoyed a special status in the delta, where cotton is king. They were at once insiders and outsiders, but compared to the degrading position of blacks, Jews were, for all practical purposes, blessed.

Mainly shopkeepers in towns like Greenwood, Cleveland, Vicksburg and Indianola, Jews won almost complete acceptance from their white gentile neighbors. And yet, as the film makes clear, they struggled with the gnawing feeling that they didn't quite belong.

Anti-Semitism, we're told, played little or no part in day-to-day dealings, but fear of it never dissipated. The social and political upheavals of the 1950s and 1960s, the decades of racial reform enforced by the federal government, released hidden resentments and made Jews acutely aware of their marginality.

Jews were under pressure to join the Citizens' Council, which fought de-segregation tooth and nail, and many did so "to get along." We're left with the impression that while bigotry was not in their hearts, local Jews did not appreciate the presence of "outside agitators," some of whom were northern Jews.

"These people had no business down here," says one Jewish man. "They were not our kind of people," observes a Jewish woman. Indeed, the issue was so explosive that some rabbis "stayed clear" of it.

De-segregation was not the only problem faced by delta Jews. Since the late 1940s, Jews have migrated from the area, and today, the Jewish population has dwindled to 300 from a high of 1,500 in 1945.

Identity and guilt are the issues at the core of Dan Tal's Hebrew-language documentary, Split (May 3 at 2 p.m.). Tal, 30, and his father, a German convert to Judaism, travel to Germany to confront the past. The results are edifying.

More than 30 years ago, Bernd Kandeler deserted from the German armed forces, then settled on a kibbutz. Kandeler, a Lutheran, was drawn to Israel for essentially two reasons. He was ashamed of Germany's central role in the Holocaust, and he was swept away by the idealism he sensed in Israel.

On the kibbutz, he met and

married a Jewish woman whose parents were Holocaust survivors. They objected to the match, but eventually reconciled themselves to it. Later, Kandeler changed his name to Ben Tal.

In Split, a reference to the Tal family's dual identity, father and son embark on a whirlwind journey. They visit a church in the company of relatives. They discuss the concept of collective guilt with Ben's brother and his daughter-in-law. They investigate the wartime career of Ben's uncle Wolfgang, a newsreel cameraman who was "the mouth and the eyes" of the Nazi regime.

At the conclusion of their odyssey, Dan and Ben feel a greater kinship toward each other, though they have hardly come to grips with Germany's crimes against humanity. There are two glaring omissions. Ben's life on the kibbutz goes unmentioned, and his wife, though pictured, is not interviewed.

Dariusz Jablonski's Photographer (May 3 at 4 p.m.) takes us back to the Lodz ghetto, the last in Poland to be liquidated by the Nazis. The film offers a new visual perspective on the subject, since it largely unfolds against the backdrop of 400 newly-found color slides of daily life in the ghetto. The slides, taken by Walter Genewein, the Nazis' chief accountant in Lodz (Litzmanstadt), were discovered in a second-hand book store in Vienna in 1987.

Photographer is also based on German records and correspondence and on gut-wrenching eyewitness testimony from Arnold Mostowicz, a Jewish doctor in the doomed ghetto. He recalls the odor of unwashed bodies, philosophizes about the spectre of death, and commiserates with Chaim Rumkowski's terrible dilemmas. Rumkowski, of course, was the leader of Lodz's Judenrat (Jewish council).

The German reports are chilling in their inhumanity. Genewein is portrayed as a detached opportunist who eagerly bought confiscated Jewish property and who was mainly concerned with the quality of his slides.

In Andre's Lives (May 2 at 4:30 p.m.), Brad Lichtenstein draws an eerie portrait of Andre Steiner, an 89-year-old Slovakian Holocaust survivor, and his two sons, Peter and George.

Steiner, a member of the "working group" which saved 7,000 Jews, is reluctant to revisit Slovakia, having tried to wipe that memory out of his mind. But on his son's insistence, the retired architect returns to his birthplace.

The threesome visit cities in what was once Czechoslovakia – Bratislava, Brno and Prague – and pay visits to three former concentration camps, Sered, Novaky and Vyhne.

On the journey, Steiner is assailed by ambivalent feelings. He is shaken by a meeting with a Slovakian collaborator whom he once bribed and by a visit to a town where he last saw his parents. Yet he is heartened by two reunions, the first, with a Jewish woman who shared his hardships and the second, with a Christian man, who hid him and his family in their hour of duress.

Yossi Somer's The Dybbuk of the Holy Apple Field (April 29 at 7: 30 p.m. and April 30 at 1:30 p.m.), melds elements of The Exorcist and Romeo and Juliet. A modern-day romance-cum-fable set in Israel, the movie broadly addresses the Orthodox/secular rift which periodically convulses Israeli society.

The protagonists are Hanan Ben-Karina, a young man who was orphaned as a youth; Moshe Sender, a shady businessman who was Hanan's father's partner; and Lea Sender, Sender's lovely daughter.

When Hanan and Lea fall in love, Sender unsheathes a battery of dirty tricks to derail their relationship. Sparks fly and passions flow, but The Dybbuk of the Holy Apple Field is an unappealing concoction which relies inordinately on histrionics and special effects.

Dariusz Jablonski's Photography takes us back to the Lodz Ghetto.

Museum of memories

By NANCY WIGSTON
Special to The CJN

MONTREAL — Each object on display at the Montreal Holocaust Memorial Centre once belonged to a survivor who later came to this city.

The first museum of its kind in North America, it welcomed its first visitors in 1979.

Directed by Bill Surkis, the centre now attracts some 37,000 visitors a year. In addition, it offers several series and outreach programs that help educate some 90,000 people about the grim realities of the Holocaust.

Yet, as visitors go from room to room, they see clearly that the displays focus firmly on the affirmation of life, as they show how Jewish and human values were sustained in eastern Europe, even in the face of death.

My guide, Paula Bultz, was born in Warsaw, and came to Canada at age four. Her tour stresses the personal aspects of the artifacts on display. Hidden in the ground or given to neighbors for safekeeping, all the items, she says, testify to the "moral and spiritual resistance" of the Jewish people. Their symbolism is poignant, as is that of the huge menorahs outside the Warsaw Synagogue pictured after they survived destruction on May 16, 1943.

Personal mementos comprise the bulk of the displays. In the first room, we find a Hebrew character typewriter; a kiddush cup with a saucer to catch the overflowing wine; a brightly embroidered Torah cover; and a theatre poster advertising a production of Carmen starring Yiddish theatre star, Ida Kaminska. Through these objects, an indelible picture of daily Jewish life in prewar Europe emerges before our eyes.

Survivors have sometimes donated the only evidence of their vanished way of life – "a tremendous compliment to us," says Bultz.

Interspersed with the exhibits are videotaped oral histories. A map shows the many and varied Jewish communities in Europe. These were rooted, not transient people, though they were always a minority wherever they settled. Local variations, such as Austrian crowns on an Austrian Jewish Torah cover, speak to Jewish loyalty to their country of residence.

The defining sentiment is not as much political as personal. Photographs mark the personal passages in life: a wedding, baby photos, family and school groups, sports and music clubs. Some faces were well known, like the founder of a children's home, a popular public speaker and lecturer, who went to his death with the children in his care. But most were not. A Romanian woman doctor is represented by her medical kit and her school report card from the 1920s.

As Bultz talks, the stories behind the photos come alive. Medals awarded for boxing prowess belonged to David Kropveld of Amsterdam, who was in Auschwitz before coming to Montreal. "He speaks to schoolchildren," she says.

Other stories concern the hidden children, those protected by gentiles during the war. "Some of these children who were hidden work here in the library," Bultz says.

Pointing to young faces, she lists their accomplishments: "She's a translator. He's a doctor. She's a psychologist here in Montreal."

After such compelling evidence of Jewish vitality in the pre-war period, the displays showing growing anti-Semitic propaganda, especially in Germany, seem particularly ugly. By 1933, every level of society was penetrated by the Reich. Family and politics grew uncomfortably close: a display copy of Mein Kampf is just one of thousands given to every newly married German couple, Bultz says. A board game has as its object to "get the Jews out of Germany." One display marks Kristallnacht, the beginning of the end of the Jewish community in Europe.

But even in the face of devastation, there was humanity. A neighbor gave a Jewish friend a double-bottomed brush in which to hide her jewelry, and its long journey ended in Montreal.

Even in the camps, the human spirit lived in the form of hidden diaries, newspapers and even schools. A heart-shaped autograph book was given to Fania Landau by fellow inmates in the Auschwitz munitions factory. Lodz ghetto workers sewed together the pants and sleeves on military uniforms as a form of sabotage.

As we examine some of the retrieved objects – a cutlery set buried in Russia; a letter from a Denver relative returned from Poland with the scrawled notation, "house burned down" – a volunteer stops to say hello.

He is Gustav Grossman. After the war, he helped a friend dig up a box of the family linen in northern Hungary, he tells us.

The last room, with six memorial panels for the six million dead, is sombre and spare, a place for remembrance and meditation.

This centre – which will double in size in early 2000, expanding on Jewish life before and after the Holocaust – brings tangible memories to life. Its theme is hope.

The Montreal Holocaust Memorial Centre is currently located in the Cavendish Mall, 514-345-2605.

Stone Craft Monuments: Good Service - Guaranteed Workmanship

Stone Craft Monument Factory owners David Friedman and Shai Lobart, are working together to ensure that the needs of their customers are met sensitively and fairly. Clients in the community can rest assured they will receive considerate service in choosing the appropriate monument to honour their loved one.

Friedman and Lobart, natives of Israel, started in the monument business about 8 years ago, when they were delivering monuments to cemeteries. "When we were installing the stones, we found many mistakes in the Hebrew. We realized that not everyone understands Hebrew, and many people did not even know that the stone was wrong," said Friedman, whose grandfather was in the granite business in Hungary, and whose brother is a sculptor and father is an artist.

Because Hebrew is their native tongue, said Friedman, it was very helpful and easier for their customers. "We are able to guide them through the Hebrew and ensure that everything is 100% correct. We got wonderful feedback about our work. Our stones look different because of our style of Hebrew lettering."

Friedman designed his grandmother's monument in Israel before he even knew he would one day go into the business himself. "I guess you can say the business is in my blood."

The pair, whose sons have now entered the business, began importing granite and engraving stones. "Eventually we expanded to the present factory, a much large. facility on Brisbane Road in Downsview."

Cemeteries have very strict regulations surrounding quality of granite, size and shape of monument; Stone Craft Monuments are accepted by all cemeteries. We take the burden off families by having all of the accurate and updated information regarding cemetery regulations.

Friedman and Lobart, whose parents are Holocaust survivors, are very sensitive to the needs of customers who are ordering a stone for someone who lost family in the war. "We engrave on the back of the stone at no extra charge, all the names of their family members who died. This is a beautiful way to remember those family members who perished in the Holocaust, and do not have family monuments honouring them. Coming from a family of survivors, we realize how important it is to help each other keep up the memories. It is something that comes from our hearts.

Stone Craft imports granite from Africa, India and China, said Lobart. "There are different colours and grades of granite; we use only the best because we want to make sure that our monuments last indefinitely. We also engrave the stone to the maximum depth. For letters to endure, engraving must be deep. To engrave that deep takes double the time, but the end results are worth the effort."

When families come in to see them, said Friedman, "they present us with the names and dates they want engraved, and we produce a computer design for them. Before the design is approved, we make sure that the Hebrew portion is approved by a rabbi. A third party is necessary to make absolutely sure everything is perfect. An artist, who works with us, makes sure that her design is correctly produced in accordance with Jewish law and tradition, and to the complete satisfaction of the customer's personal requests. The computer design is an exact replica of what will be on the stone, so customers can see exactly what they are getting."

Friedman and Lobart understand that ordering a monument is a very difficult and painful thing to do for many people. "We believe that it is easier for Jewish people to deal with other Jews at such a time, because it is a bit easier to develop a good rapport. According to Halachah, the stone must be ordered as quickly as possible, so if necessary, we are able to have a stone ready in one day. We want everyone to be comfortable with whatever they have decided."

> "It is popularly assumed that the monument must be erected approximately 12 months after death. In reality, only few scholars hold this view. There is every reason, based on major commentaries and numerous sources and long tradition, to arrange for the tombstone to be built as soon after shiva as possible."

Friedman and Lobart stress that they now have over 60% of the Jewish market, not only because of their quality and service, but because of their prices. "Because we are wholesalers, we are able to save people money. Nobody can beat our quality, prices and workmanship."

Most important, said Friedman, they both feel that they are doing something very special for the community. "We deal with people who are going through all kinds of emotions and we try to make them as happy as possible under the circumstances. My heart feels good when I've completed a monument to complete satisfaction."

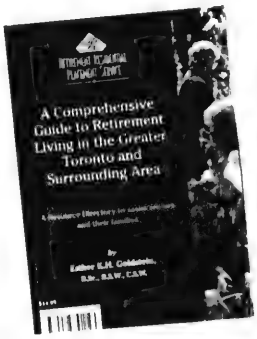
Directory assists in choosing retirement living facility

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN



TORONTO — Choosing a retirement home or long-term care facility for a parent or loved one is not an easy task.

"It is often made more difficult by rigid time constraints, both personal and those set by the hospital or caregiver," says Esther Goldstein, a hospital social worker who works primarily with seniors. Currently, she works at Sunnybrook Health Science Centre.

Goldstein, who has a degree in social work from Ryerson Polytechnical University, says that with increasingly long waiting lists for nursing homes, more and more people have begun to turn to the private sector to provide care for the elderly who are sick or too dependent to return home.

"I have watched repeatedly how families struggle with accepting that someone they love can't return to their home."

A year ago, Goldstein sent detailed questionnaires to numerous residences, and compiled a publication titled A Comprehensive Guide to Retirement Homes in the Greater Toronto Area, a resource directory to assist seniors and their families in choosing a retirement living facility.

"The response to the first edition was incredible," says Goldstein. A large number were circulated free to social service agencies in the areas covered in the book.

The 1999 edition titled A Comprehensive Guide to Retirement Living in the Greater Toronto and Surrounding Area is twice the size (200 pages) as the first publication.

There are comprehensive listings of the centres, which include special features, residence information, staffing, health services, accommodation, dining services, amenities and activities, services included in the fee, and rental information.

The guide also provides information on numerous topics, such as wills and powers of attorney, tips on choosing a facility, how to make the transition easier, special needs facilities, as well as resources and support services.

"Once [the people who run] retirement homes saw the original book, they gladly contributed to this book. As well, I added a section on seniors apartment buildings to broaden the scope of information for people unsure of where their needs fit within the existing available options."

The guide also includes key features of the centres, including information on air conditioning, whether cognitively impaired or disabled people are accepted, cultural groups available, kitchens in suites, nonsmoking suites, nursing staff, open pantry, special diets, and pets allowed.

The guide is available at several hospital gift shops. For more information, call 457-6554, or fax 905-761-6264.

PASSING ON THE TRADITION

Rita and Sol Dennis recently celebrated the bnei mitzvah of three of their grandsons in Israel at Massada with 20 family members. The family toured for two weeks with Sarah Pachter and described the celebration and visit as "thrilling."

Sol says that teaching his three grandsons to put on tfillin just as his father had taught him and he had taught his son, was "overwhelming—a thrill of a lifetime."

Seen in the photo taken at Massada are [from left] son-in-law Steven Kaminsky married to Cheryl Dennis, bar mitzvah Kyle Samuel Kaminsky, grandfather Leon Kaminsky, bar mitzvah Zachary Dennis, father Steven Dennis married to Rebecca Berkelhammer, bar mitzvah Dustin Dennis Anklewicz , grandfather of bnei mitzvah Sol Dennis, and son-in-law Sheldon Anklewicz married to Cindy Dennis.

Hockey nights in Canada leave little time for much else

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
CJN Staff

TORONTO — I'm a hockey mother, but not by choice. Hockey chose me. As a mother of three sons it was virtually inevitable.

The boys, aged six, nine and 11, are all hockey enthusiasts. Between their games and practices, there are eight to nine visits to the arenas every week. And that doesn't include tournaments.

Our household revolves around hockey, with a game almost every other night. On weekends it feels as if we live at the arena. My oldest son even has a standing game every Saturday night...So much for having a life.

I'm a rather unlikely candidate for hockey mother. I'm not the type to hit the arena at 6 a.m. I can barely get my kids to school on time.

Until recently I felt a little guilty about not being a real hockey mom – the type who arrives at the arena at the crack of dawn, with three kids in tow, smiling as she lugs the hockey bag.

But I discovered the proverbial hockey mom is a bit of an urban myth. I thought there were legions of these dedicated women, when in fact, the true-blue hockey mom is a rare breed. A few die-hard moms show up at those early morning games, but mainly, it's the dads who are there.

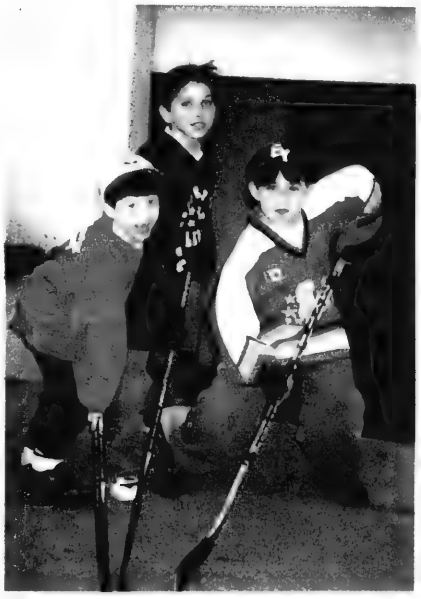
I certainly don't see too many moms when I take my 6-year-old to hockey. I'm usually the only mother in the change room.

However, the arena is swarming with dads. They don't just watch from the bleachers. Half of them are out on the ice, skating and hollering and helping out. They look like they're having as much fun as the kids.

Essentially, the dads run the house league teams. Each team has a hierarchy of coaches and assistant coaches. My husband – Mr. Keen I call him – helps out when the assistant coaches can't make it. He's just thrilled when he gets the call.

It's his job to take the kids to most of the their games and practices, leaving me to do hockey detail when he's not available. In reality, I don't go to that many games. I'm a hockey widow. I stay home with whichever of the kids aren't playing.

My husband never seems to tire of the games, which is a good thing for our sons. He enjoys the endless marathon of week-night games and quickie suppers on the run. He doesn't seem to need a life.



Mathew, Leigh and Evan Silverstein

Just recently my 6-year-old informed us that he wants to play select hockey next year. Just what I needed – another three games added to our weekly schedule. But I'll cross that bridge next year.

Right now it's playoff time and the countdown to the end of season has started. For me the playoffs are kind of a win-win situation. If my sons' teams win, I feel happy for them. Any self-respecting mother would. But if they lose, they're one game closer to elimination and for me, that's almost as good as a win. Not that I would ever admit that out loud.

The end of hockey season isn't exactly a happy time for the boys – hubby included. After months of getting together three to four times a week or more, the teams break up. The friendships formed don't always survive. Many kids move up to other levels.

So I don't crack open the champagne when the gear is shelved for the season.

Besides I don't have all that much to celebrate.

With spring around the corner, soccer, softball, ball hockey and tennis will soon be under way. Once the warm weather starts, I'll be spending evenings and weekends shuttling between parks.

Did I say something about having a life?

Summer youth games on tap

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Despite a recent heavy snowfall in Toronto, organizers of the city's Jewish youth team are thinking summer as they gear up for an upcoming sports extravaganza.

Teen athletes in a variety of disciplines are being recruited to participate in the JCC Maccabi Youth Games, which will be held in Rochester, N.Y., from Aug. 15 to 20.

The Toronto contingent will include about 100 athletes aged 13 to 17, who will compete in both team and individual sports, said Irv Gottesman, chair of the committee charged with assembling the team.

Toronto will send teams in both boys and girls basketball, boys volleyball, boys baseball, girls softball and boys soccer. In addition, male and female athletes in swimming, track and field, tennis and golf are also slated to participate in the regional games.

Tryouts for the various sports are being held intermittently, with notices for times and places posted in CJN ads, Gottesman said.

In the past, Toronto has scooped up its fair share of medals, thanks in large part to strong teams in baseball and basketball. The Bathurst Jewish Centre's boys hoops team usually forms the nucleus of the group sent to the regional games, while additional players are recruited from high school teams.

In boys baseball, many of the players come from a Thornhill club team, Gottesman said.

The girl's softball team boasts no such single source of players, but efforts are under way to find them in a variety of community teams.

Recruiters were disappointed when only two girls showed up for a tryout for a proposed volleyball team. The idea for a team was subsequently shelved – at least for this year.

"We try to have as many girls as boys. We try to promote a 50/50 mix," Gottesman said.

The regional games are expected to attract as many as 2,000 young athletes from communities in Eastern Canada and the United States, including Montreal, Hamilton, Ottawa, Rochester, Buffalo, Detroit and Hartford. Other regional games will be held in Columbus, Ohio, Cherry Hill, N.J. and Houston, Tex.

"We're not just looking for elite athletes, it's a complete Jewish experience," Gottesman said.

Participants will enjoy a Shabbaton, they will participate in classes to discuss aspects of Jewish life and they will, of course, make friends with other young Jewish athletes, he added.

For more information, contact Grant Smith, head of the Toronto delegation, at 636-1880.

Yehuda Levin and human life

As I was saying...

By RON CSILLAG

Rabbi Yehuda Levin blew into Toronto from Brooklyn like a hurricane, huffing and puffing and threatening to blow our house down. I'll say this for him: his defence of Human Life International (HLI), the high-voltage anti-abortion group, is articulate and lightning-quick, and he's eminently quotable, evidenced by his ubiquitous comments in the Toronto media during the organization's annual conference held here earlier this month.

HLI is no ordinary pro-life group. Even by the hot-button standards of the current debate on abortion, at least in the United States, it is radical and proudly extremist, and has been accused of being homophobic and anti-Semitic. Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) has called HLI "dangerous," and has led the way in disseminating the anti-Jewish ravings of its founder, Father Paul Marx.

In a chapter of his 1987 book, headed Pro-Abortion Jews and the New Holocaust, Father Marx accuses Jews of leading the "greatest holocaust in all history," exhorts his followers to look up abortion providers in the phone book and note the Jewish names – For what reason? Is it a coincidence that of the last six attacks on abortion doctors, five have been Jewish? – and adds he thinks he can prove that Jews in Israel "have one of the highest abortion rates in the world."

With this crude tripe, Rabbi Levin, the father of nine, agrees, saying that an "inordinate amount of Jewish organizations support abortion on demand," while HLI's assertions about Jews are "painful but factual." He exonerates Father Marx and HLI of anti-Semitism by pointing out that they have donated "thousands" of dollars to the pro-life movement in Israel.

Following a heated press conference on the eve of the HLI gathering, he vilified Congress for "wild, irresponsible actions," saying it's "shameful that you [CJC] make your bed with pro-choice groups and militant homosexuals." He fumed to reporters, that like Father Marx, he was being "tarred and feathered," and he vaguely threatened legal action, possibly to a beit din.

So instead of innuendo, let's stick to the facts: Rabbi Levin's been active in the anti-choice and "family values" movement since 1978, and is associated with a number of groups that work closely with the U.S. radical Christian right, including Jews for Morality. He's gone on record as saying that abortion can be fairly compared to the Holocaust.

Fact: Rabbi Levin was a vocal supporter of Pat Buchanan's campaign to win the 1996 Republican nomination for the presidency. This is the same Pat Buchanan who disparaged American Jews as Israel's "amen corner" in Washington, and whose supporters wave signs reading, "Guns, God and Pat."

Fact: Rabbi Levin is a staunch defender of both Joan Andrews Bell and Donald Treshman. Bell is an Operation Rescue activist who was sentenced to five years in prison for invading a Pensacola abortion clinic. A soft-spoken mother of three, she told the Toronto Sun after addressing the HLI conference that while she considers it murder to kill abortion doctors at their homes, killing them at a clinic might be all right. "If they're shot as they're walking into an abortion mill, I will accept whatever the church teaches on that – whether it's justifiable homicide, like a policeman shooting a terrorist."

Treshman, who was hired as HLI's publicist last year, was one of 12 defendants found guilty in February for an anti-abortion Web site, called Nuremberg Files. The site lists abortion doctors' names, addresses, license plates and even the names of their children. Three doctors whose names appeared on the list were later killed by a sniper. The jury ruled the site amounted to a death threat, and ordered the defendants to pay $107 million in damages.

Fact: In 1992, Rabbi Levin defended Project Rescue demonstrators who arrived, singing Christmas carols, to picket the home of a Jewish doctor who was celebrating Chanukah.

Fact: Testifying before a congressional committee in 1997, Rabbi Levin urged the U.S. Congress to withhold its annual allocation to the Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington because it includes exhibits on gay victims of the Nazis. Attempts "to create a moral equivalency" between the Nazis' gay and Jewish victims is "intellectual sodomy," he stated. The rabbi appeared alongside one Scott Lively of the chillingly named International Committee for Holocaust Truth, who said homosexuals were responsible for both war-era and neo-Nazism.

As my Bubbie used to say, you can tell a lot about someone by the company he keeps.

About Seniors

Dear Jesse,

My father, a retired university professor and researcher, had a stroke. He remains in hospital. He does not have much use of his right side. The hospital would like to discharge him. He lives alone. I have my own children and grandchildren whom I care for and cannot see how I can further divide my time. It hurts me terribly to see my father in this situation. What should I do?

JR

Dear JR,

Your situation is indeed a sad one. Hospitals understandably have policies to free acute-care beds as soon as it is appropriate. Most hospitals have a discharge co-ordinator whose task it is to appropriately organize the discharge of patients who no longer need acute-care services. In order to do so, they must organize a care plan for him.

You may need the assistance of a trained advocate to help you ensure that this care plan meets your father's needs, and does not overburden you. Some agencies have trained volunteer advocates or professional staff who would be available to assist you throughout this process to ensure your needs are met. It is difficult to be caregiver to three generations of family!

Readers are invited to send any questions they have for Jesse to The CJN. Jesse is the executive director of Jewish Support Services for the Elderly (JSSE) in Montreal.

What are you laughing at?

Veteran Pillsbury spokes-model Pop N. Fresh died yesterday of a severe yeast infection. He was 71. Dozens of celebrities turned out for the funeral including Mrs. Butterworth, Betty Crocker, Chef Boyardee, and the Hostess Twinkies.

The grave site was piled high with flours as longtime friend Aunt Jemima delivered the eulogy, describing Fresh as a man who never knew how much he was kneaded.

Fresh rose quickly in show business, but his later life was filled with many turnovers. He was not considered a very smart cookie, wasting much of his dough on half-baked schemes. Still, even as a crusty old man, he was a roll model for millions.

Fresh is survived by his second wife. They have two children and another in the oven. The funeral was held at 3:50 for about 20 minutes.

Twelve babies born in Macedonia field hospital

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd. and CJN News Services

JERUSALEM — Israel Defence Forces doctors returned last week from their 16-day mission to Stenkovec, on the Kosovo-Macedonia border, after treating some 1,600 Kosovar patients, and delivering 12 babies at a field hospital set up in the refugee camp.

The 70 doctors and nurses who ran the field hospital, returned to Israel with two Kosovar refugees, who had worked as translators at the hospital and had asked to come to Israel. Their request was personally approved by Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu.

Last week, Israel gave refuge to 112 Kosovo residents, forced from their homes by the Serbian army following the NATO bombing of Yugoslavia. The refugees will be allowed to remain in Israel for six months, after which their status will be reviewed based on the situation in their homeland.

Meantime, the Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI) reports that 16 more Kosovar Jews are now safe in Israel. Of the 73 Jews in Kosovo before the war began, 30 remain in the region, and are said to be reluctant to leave.

And of the 300 Belgrade Jews who were taken to Budapest early in the war, 200 are expected to arrive in Israel before the month's end, officials say.

Last Thursday night, a planeload of 48 Yugoslavian Jews who had been taken to Budapest touched down in Israel. Of those, about 10 have expressed an interest to stay.

On Friday, Netanyahu was scheduled to meet with a group of new Yugoslav arrivals in his office.

With the latest arrivals, the number of Yugoslav Jews in Israel is about 150, and the majority are between 18 and 35 years old,

'An historical injustice'

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

TORONTO — Mair Musafija, a Jewish refugee from Bosnia, claims that NATO's aerial bombing campaign of Yugoslavia is legally and morally indefensible.

"NATO has no legal and moral authority to bomb Yugoslavia," he declared last week. "Nor do they have the means to solve the problem in Kosovo."

Musafija, whose wife Sladjana is of Serbian Greek Orthodox and Jewish origin, said that boiling ethnic tensions in Kosovo – a province of Yugoslavia populated mainly by ethnic Albanian Muslims – should be resolved by Serbians and Albanians through negotiations and not at the point of a gun.

A 37-year-old clerk in Citibank's credit processing department, Musafija contacted The CJN out of concern that NATO – the western military alliance of which Canada is a charter member – is committing an "historical injustice" in Yugoslavia.

Jewish refugee from Bosnia criticizes NATO

Before the outbreak of the 1991 civil war, Yugoslavia was a federation consisting of Slovenia, Croatia, Montenegro, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Serbia, Vojvodina, Kosovo and Macedonia.

As a result of the wars of secession, Yugoslavia has been reduced to a rump state comprising Serbia, Montenegro, Vojvodina and, reluctantly, Kosovo.

NATO, led by the United States, has accused the Yugoslavian government, headed by President Slobodan Milosevic, of war crimes. The international war crimes tribunal in The Hague charges that Yugoslavian forces have terrorized and killed Kosovo Albanians, destroyed their villages and driven them out in a brutal campaign of ethnic cleansing.

NATO began launching air strikes against Yugoslavia on March 24 to deter Milosevic, and compel him to withdraw his forces from Kosovo.

As the conflict escalates, the Israeli government, as well as major Jewish organizations in the west, have come out in support of NATO's bombardment of Yugoslavia. In a half-page ad in the New York Times on April 18, the

Collins To Appeal

VICTORIA — Controversial newspaper columnist Doug Collins is appealing an order of a B.C. Human Rights Tribunal that found four of his articles promoted hatred or contempt of Jews. Collins' lawyer, Doug Christie, will ask the court to declare unconstitutional the section of the B.C. Human Rights Act which deals with hate promotion. Christie said the section is an unreasonable infringement on the right to free speech. Last summer, adjudicator Tom Patch ruled that the four Collins articles, which appeared in the North Shore News, together promoted hatred of Jews. He ordered Collins and the newspaper to pay Harry Abrams, the complainant, $2,000 for loss of self-respect and dignity.

Supplies Received

MONTREAL — A representative of the Honduran consulate here reports that the seven containers of clothes, blankets, boots and toys shipped in December and January have reached their destination. In December, Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) donated $12,500 to cover the costs of shipping goods received at the Honduran consulate here. The merchandise had been collected to help victims of Hurricane Mitch but was sitting in two Montreal warehouses for several months because transporting them to Honduras was too costly.

JIAS Conference

WINNIPEG — Jewish Immigrant Aid Services of Canada (JIAS) is putting finishing touches to a one-day conference intended to help new arrivals. The May 16 conference, called Immigrant to Immigrant, will bring together Jewish emigres who have become successful since their arrival in Canada to serve as mentors, teachers and potential employers to a group of more recent arrivals. Details may be obtained by calling 416-630-9051 or at www.jias.org.

ISRAEL

Extradition Law Passed

JERUSALEM — The Knesset has passed a law making it easier to extradite Israeli citizens charged with committing crimes abroad. Under the new law, those who hold Israeli citizenship but are not residents of the country will be extradited, while residents will be tried in the Jewish state. The law was prompted by, but does not affect, the case of Samuel Sheinbein, a Maryland teenager accused of killing an acquaintance. Sheinbein fled to Israel in September 1997 and fought extradition to the United States by claiming Israeli citizenship through his father.

Terror Fatalities Drop

JERUSALEM — The number of Israeli fatalities from terror attacks dropped over the past two years, the head of the nation's anti-terrorism task force told the cabinet. There were 131 terror-related Israeli deaths in 1995 and 1996, and 46 in the following two years, according to Meir Dagan. Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu claimed credit for the decline, saying it was a "badge of honor" for his government.

WORLD

Jews Protest at Reichstag

BERLIN — A small group of concentration camp survivors protested this month outside Berlin's newly renovated and opened Reichstag, or parliament, charging that Germans are too ready to forget the victims of Nazism. Meanwhile, the Central Council of Jews in Germany officially dedicated its new headquarters here, and work began on a new school for Jewish teachers, sponsored by the New York-based Ronald S. Lauder Foundation.

Wallenberg Statue Unveiled

BUDAPEST — A statue commemorating the heroism of Swedish diplomat Raoul Wallenberg was unveiled last week here. Hundreds of people braved pouring rain to honor Wallenberg, credited with saving about 100,000 Hungarian Jews from the Nazis.

Satmar Rabbi Sentenced

NEW YORK — A leader of the Satmar chassidic community has admitted channeling more than $6 million illegally from the New York City school system to a private Jewish girls school in the Williamsburg section of Brooklyn. Rabbi Hertz Frankel pleaded guilty this month to felony charges of conspiracy after he admitted placing as many as 80 Jewish women in non-existent jobs on the district payroll, and diverting their paychecks to the Beis Rachel School, where he was principal. He was sentenced to three years' probation and ordered to pay $1 million in restitution.

Macedonian Jews Plot Future

SKOPJE — As NATO bombs punish Yugoslavia for abusing ethnic Albanians in Kosovo, the odds are growing that Macedonia will either be dragged into a wider Balkan war or erupt in a civil war of its own.

So, just as hundreds of Yugoslav Jews have taken refuge in neighboring Hungary, Macedonia's Jews may one day find shelter with the Jews in next-door Bulgaria. For now, however, the 190 or so Macedonian Jews say they are staying put.

"We have always shared the fate of the people of this country," Viktor Mizrahi, president of the Jewish community of Macedonia, said in an interview with JTA. "So we will continue to protect the interests of both the country and the Jewish community."

During the Holocaust, the Jewish community was nearly obliterated. Roughly 7,300 died at the hands of Bulgarian fascists. The country's Jews are in 52 families, though it's estimated there are some 200 to 300 unaffiliated Jews elsewhere in Macedonia.

Israel has built the first field hospital for Albanian refugees here, contributed $100,000 worth of medicine to the Macedonian relief effort and have taken in more than 100 refugees.

El Al launches new non-stop service from Toronto

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — El Al Israel Airlines, long associated with cramped seating, little leg-room, smoke-filled cabins, mediocre food and frequent landings has turned over a new leaf as it attempts to make itself more responsive to passengers' needs.

Last week, El Al unveiled its new Boeing 767-200 extended range aircraft that will fly non-stop from Toronto to Tel Aviv twice a week. And fly them in comfort, according to El Al general manager Moshe Shamai.

Shamai presided over a chagigah, a small party, to celebrate the new Thursday non-stop flights to Israel, and to invite a select group of travel agents and community leaders to tour the airline's new 767.

One of two 767-200s purchased recently from Air France, the plane featured increased leg-room and spacious seating. That was accomplished by removing 24 of the plane's 224 seats to make the 12-hour flight to Israel more comfortable, Shamai said.

El Al's meals, prepared under contract in Lufthansa Airline's kosher kitchen, have also been upgraded, he said. El Al's chief chef spent five days in the kitchens, suggesting new recipes and advising the cooks on how to make the meals tastier, he said. El Al has been using the new menus since last summer.

Passengers travelling to Israel from Toronto, will now have four flight options each week during the spring, summer and fall seasons.

The 767s will fly non-stop to Tel Aviv on Thursdays and Sundays, while larger capacity 747s will fly on Mondays and Wednesdays via Montreal.

The Thursday flights, which arrive in Israel at 7:30 a.m. on Friday, give passengers a full day in Israel prior to the onset of Shabbat, Shamai said.

El Al believes the changes fulfil the airline's promise of improving its service. "We are committed to a significant improvement," Shamai said. "We hope the people will try us, and experience the significant changes made by El Al to serve the Canadian market."

Shamai rejected suggestions El Al made the changes because of competition from Air Canada, which also offers non-stop flights to Israel from Toronto.

El Al's flights are meant to satisfy the demands of its passengers while doing so in an economical manner, he said.

Until the introduction of the two new 767s, El Al serviced the Toronto market with larger capacity 747s. To fill the aircraft, they often had to stop in New York to load more passengers. With the acquisition of the 767s, which are fitted with powerful 747 engines, El Al has combined "lower capacity with long range," he said.

The aircraft will also serve the Chicago market, flying non-stop to Tel Aviv, he added.

THE SIX BIGGEST MISTAKES PEOPLE MAKE WHEN MANAGING THEIR INVESTMENTS

As Canadians, we should be spending more time thinking about investments and tax strategies.

Most Canadians spend too much time worrying about their RRSP portfolios and not enough time thinking about their overall investment strategy. Remember, your RRSP is limited to $13,500 and if you are in a pension plan, your maximum is even less.

Here are some of the biggest mistakes people make when managing their investments.

1. People rarely know what it is they actually want to accomplish with their money.

Good things rarely happen until investors set specific financial goals and direct their actions towards the realization of those objectives. Most people simply don't have a financial plan; perhaps it is due to our impatience or the belief that they can only get rich from lotteries. What most people don't understand is that money, well invested, can accumulate into significant wealth.

2. Too many people procrastinate endlessly about making financial decisions.

Most investors wait for the "time to be just right" before starting an investment program. Usually, they are baffled by the sheer variety of options and choices and lack the knowledge to act decisively. This procrastination can end up being the greatest barrier to reaching financial goals. The reality is, the time may never be "just right" when investing money. Keep in mind, time is against you. You cannot turn back the clock and regain the compounded growth that has been lost. Worse yet, every day puts you closer to the day when you will need your retirement savings to maintain your lifestyle.

From the editor's desk

We have answers to find

Thankfully, we have not yet reached the point where, having seen so much that is abhorrent, we fail to be shocked.

The cold-blooded assault and massacre on the students and teachers of Columbine High School in Littleton, Colo. is the most recent example of rampant evil among young people.

As more and more details emerge of the murderous scheme plotted and executed by the two presumed perpetrators, our hearts are sickened even as our spines are chilled.

It could have been worse. Many more could have been killed.

But indeed, in a certain sense, how could it be worse?

How is it possible that so much distance could exist between the intellect and the conscience of people so young?

There is no doubt that 18-year-old Eric Harris and 17-year-old Dylan Klebold were intelligent, bright teenagers.

But, alas, there is equally no doubt they were also evil, without any moral compass to direct them between right and wrong.

The police and other forensic specialists are meticulously investigating the facts of the crime. In due course, probably very soon, they will be able to piece together a complete reconstruction of the technique and the technicality of the massacre.

But their work is the easy part. They are "only" investigating the visible, outer manifestations of the teens' criminal behavior.

The harder part of the crime will take much longer to investigate. And the pieces will not be reconstructed as exactly or fall as precisely in place as the facts of the crime.

The harder part will be to try to fully and completely understand the motive of the crime, the underlying character dementia that separates free will from morality and morality from free will.

This part involves the boys' parents, teachers and peers. It involves social and behavioral scientists. It involves doctors and philosophers. It involves politicians and entrepreneurs.

It involves us all.

We have created a civilization increasingly dependent on machines. Harris and Klebold were devotees of machines, namely their computers and the Internet highway, which they constantly travelled to dark and sinister destinations.

But in a civilization of machines, we need a human anchor.

It is a mug's game and of little value, at this point, to pinpoint cultural and sociological "scapegoats" for the cause of their deviant, abnormal and violent behavior. It is simply too complicated a problem with too many contributing specific and general factors.

Undoubtedly, music, videos, films, the "hypnosis" of the Internet, personal problems, family relations, peer pressures all played a role in molding the final clay into the ghoulish golems they became, happy at calculating the deaths of their colleagues to the minutest detail.

But what are the lessons and how do we learn them?

In a well-written essay that appeared in last weekend's Globe and Mail, Jennifer Curtis, an Ottawa journalist, put forward one theory for the social distress and violent behavior among teenagers such as Harris and Klebold.

She explained the phenomenon on the basis of the recent book by Yale Law professor Lawrence Friedman, entitled The Horizontal Society.

In a thumbnail sketch, Friedman's thesis, according to Curtis, is that traditional, hierarchical relations such as "parents, bosses, heads of state, priests and others," are influencing modern life less and less.

"Modern communication technology" has created a more horizontal society in which youngsters are able to interact with "like-minded people in groups that do not meet face-to-face but through the miracles of technology.

"The key to Prof. Friedman's thesis," writes Curtis, "is what he calls the horizontal identity, which confers a feeling of power, potency and freedom, and distracts us from the barren landscape of disconnectedness that is modern life.

"The horizontal identity is a feeling that anything is possible... we feel we can transcend the boundaries of our primary identity, such as gender, religion and race and carve out new identities."

The Friedman analysis may indeed be on the right track.

The horizontal identity may indeed be the offspring of the Internet, high-tech, global, fibre-optic, satellite age we are passing on to our children.

And youngsters may indeed be increasingly imbued with a sense of new possibility and may indeed be carving out new identities for themselves.

But how can we explain that the new identity Harris and Klebold chose was that of the Nazi stormtrooper?

Where do we look to know why they chose Adolf Hitler as their hero?

As we move deeper into the new age, we had better start to work on trying to find these answers. MBD

Vaughan bylaw could restrict shul size, location

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

VAUGHAN — Jewish organizations in the City of Vaughan fear that proposed changes to bylaws governing houses of worship would restrict future synagogues' size and location.

The city is seeking to make its bylaws on houses of worship conform to its own official plan and to those of York Region, which prohibit the building of new facilities on agricultural land and set standards on size.

The city stresses that its proposals are very preliminary, but Jewish and other religious groups are concerned that changes would result in increased costs, inconvenience and, in some cases, impede a person's ability to worship.

The amendments would disallow houses of worship from being built in agricultural zones, restricting them to primary or arterial roads.

They would also set standards on size, both "small-scale" and "large-scale," and replace the current definition of church with an updated, non-denominational definition that includes the range of activities that can occur at a house of worship.

The city had earlier taken notice of the Jewish community's concern that a broadened definition of "place of worship" would adversely affect minyans held in people's homes. The city has reassured the community that under its proposals, a house would not be considered a place of worship if its primary use is a residence.

The city has also assured that existing religious schools and places of worship will not be affected by the amendments.

The city said the changes – whatever form they will take – will affect only new buildings or those which require permits for major renovations.

At a packed public hearing in the city's council chamber last week, Jewish representatives pointed out that often, the only land available on which to build a new synagogue is zoned as agricultural.

Norm Grafstein, representing the Canadian Friends of Aish Hatorah, told council members and Mayor Lorna Jackson that the proposals, as they now stand, would make life difficult for Orthodox Jews.

He explained that restricting new synagogues to certain roads could prevent Orthodox Jews from attending, since the buildings might be too far to walk to. He said limiting the size of synagogues might not be feasible for York Region, home to Canada's fastest-growing Jewish community.

A man saying he represents philanthropist Joe Berman, who supports several Jewish causes, said amending the bylaw on houses of worship is "premature."

Residents also expressed concern about existing homes being converted into places of worship.

Jackson reassured residents and organizations that the City of Vaughan was not being anti-religious.

She also said she thinks it's "wrong" to disallow new houses of worship from being built on agricultural lands, and said she will ask her staff to review that provision.

Councillors said the city is still at the start of its consultation process, and that any changes are months, perhaps over a year, away.

CORRECTION

In the story "Sunnybrook holds seder for veterans," we stated that Sunnybrook was home to the first Jewish chapel in a hospital. In fact, Mount Sinai Hospital was the first in North America to build a synagogue. Part of the construction in the new hospital, the Mount Sinai Synagogue, dedicated by Fay and Joseph Tanenbaum, was opened in 1975. We regret the error.

Zundel case put on hold

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A Federal Court judge has ordered a member of a human rights tribunal to step down from a case involving Holocaust-denier Ernst Zundel because of the perception of bias.

The decision, which is being appealed, has led to the adjournment of Zundel's long-running hearing that was scheduled to resume last week.

Federal Court judge Douglas Campbell ruled that Reva Devins, a member of the three-person tribunal hearing the Zundel case, should be made to withdraw because of a press release that was issued on May 13, 1988.

The news release, issued by the Ontario Human Rights Commission (OHRC), commended a court ruling that found Zundel guilty of publishing false statements denying the Holocaust. (The Supreme Court of Canada later ruled that law unconstitutional.) Devins was a member of the OHRC at the time.

"I find that a reasonably informed bystander, knowing of the May 13, 1988 press release, would have an apprehension of bias by Ms. Devins against the applicant (Zundel)," Campbell stated.

The judge went on to say that since there were no allegations of bias against the two remaining tribunal members, the hearing could continue.

Zundel is facing a complaint under the Canadian Human Rights Act for allegedly operating an Internet Web site that distributed material likely to promote hatred or contempt of Jews.

Skinhead pleads guilty

TORONTO — One of the skinheads charged with promoting hatred against Romani (Gypsy) refugees staying at a Scarborough motel has pleaded guilty to the charge, according to Canadian Jewish Congress, which is monitoring the case.

Walter Froebrich was sentenced last week to a 90-day conditional sentence, along with one year probation. He was also ordered to have no contact with any of the other six co-defendants or any member of a white supremacist organization.

Froebrich and six others were charged after they paraded in front of the Lido Motel in August 1997 with signs that said, "Honk if you hate Gypsies."

Israel's fallen soldiers recalled at solemn service

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
CJN Staff

TORONTO — The day before one of the most joyous days in the modern Jewish calendar, Yom Ha'atzmaut, Independence Day, a solemn ceremony was held at Beth Sholom Synagogue in observance of Yom Hazikaron, a day of remembrance for the soldiers who died defending the State of Israel.

Many of the 700 community members in attendance lit memorial candles set out on a long table in the shul's lobby.

As they filed by the table they donned the symbolic floral emblem of Yom Hazikaron, the dam ha Maccabim (blood of the Maccabis). This red flower, which grows in Israel, is the official remembrance-day flower.

Teenagers from Young Judaea marched with Israeli flags at the outset of the bilingual assembly, a a mix of prayers, readings and songs. Shula Ophir, the aliyah shlichah, and Israeli Consul Irit Waidergorn were the MCs.

To date, 18,939 soldiers have died, Toronto Consul General Jehudi Kinar told the assembled group. "Sons, brothers, daughters and sisters gave all they had for our freedom...We remember our heroes to whom we owe so much."

They sacrificed their lives "to secure the continuity of our existence as a free people in our own land," Kinar said.

"The price is a very heavy one to bear, but it insures...that the tearful and tragic images we receive from Kosovo will never be broadcast from Israel, and that the Jewish people will never again be led like sheep from the slaughter house."

Rabbi Aaron Flanzreich said, that for the six million Jews who perished during the Holocaust "there was no Israel. No place to run and to hide from the anger and evil of those who hate us."

The soldiers who died in defence of Israel have paid an "awesome price...to reap what we enjoy today," he said.

"As millions in Israel paid their respects to those who have made the ultimate sacrifice to protect our nation, so we now remember and respect their gift to us."

At the ceremony, a memorial candle was lit by Tami Ben-Lulu, who lost her cousin in the helicopter disaster on the northern Israeli border, and Israeli resident Esther Etinger, who was visiting her daughter Tzipi Erez in Toronto.

Etinger lost her husband during the War of Independence, her brother during the Yom Kippur War, and her son-in-law during his military service.

After the order of the day from the IDF chief of staff was read by Col. Yaen Vered, Cantor Israel Gutman recited K'El Maleh Rachamim, the mourner's prayer. Rabbi Flanzreich said Kaddish.

Most of the audience joined in spontaneously when Orly El Balach sang Bab El-Wad – it's about the battle for Jerusalem during the War of Independence – one of the oldest and most famous Israeli war songs. The other singers were Meital Golan and Limor Twena.

Participants in the Yom Hazikaron assembly also included Hassida David, Mitch Silverstein and Israeli shlichim Yonaton Kessel of Habonim, Baruch Livrant of Batar, Noam Massad of Shomair Hazair and Ryan Hasse of Young Judaea.

The assembly was organized by the Consulate General of Israel, Toronto, in conjunction with B'nai Brith Canada, Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario Region, Canadian Zionist Federation and the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto.

FOR DECADES AFTER THE HOLOCAUST WE HAVE SHOUTED AT THE WORLD...
NEVER AGAIN!
AND FROM THE BALKANS THE WORLD NOW SHOUTS BACK ITS ANSWER EVER AGAIN!

Foot soldiers too

The Palestine Central Council convened this week in Gaza to formally deal with the issue of May 4 and a unilateral declaration of statehood. As of this writing, 24 hours before the 124-member council had actually met, it seemed certain that Yasser Arafat, the leader of the Palestinian Authority (PA) would not declare statehood but would, instead, reserve the right to do so at an appropriate and convenient future date.

In the past many weeks, Arafat has travelled the world, meeting with as many leaders of government as possible to lay the "diplomatic foundation" for his statement on statehood.

He has travelled to capitals in North America, Europe, Africa, the Middle and Far East, securing high profile photo opportunities with the "Who's Who" that live in the corridors of power. By and large, he also secured their support for Palestinian statehood though he was advised not to pronounce statehood unilaterally.

Events in Yugoslavia and more recently in Littleton, Colo. tended to overshadow the media coverage he had originally intended for his capital tour. His failure to fill page 1 of the international press notwithstanding, Arafat's triptych was useful and clever.

He was able to line up the major leaders of the world to the cause of Palestinian statehood. Presumably, he will conduct their uniform chorus after the Israeli elections.

Arafat will thus be able to report that there is wide international support for a Palestinian homeland, and that any delay in achieving that homeland (the blame for which would naturally be pinned on Israel) would amount to an attempt to thwart, not only Palestinian aspirations, but also international will.

But if Arafat is succeeding in the international diplomatic arena, he is failing in the more important arena closer to his home, namely, among Israelis.

As we have frequently written in this space, the key to a truly successful, mutually secure, long-lasting resolution to the peace process lies in Arafat's gaining the confidence and the trust of the majority of the people of Israel. Without that confidence or that trust, there will never be a signed agreement, let alone the relationship between the two peoples on which the willingness to take the necessary risks for peace must be based.

In light of the recent manouevres and games being played by Faisal Husseini, the PA official in charge of the Jerusalem "portfolio," it is difficult to see how Israelis can feel any confidence or trust in their erstwhile peace partners.

Husseini recently invited some 30 foreign diplomats for a political briefing in Orient House in east Jerusalem. His motives are transparent and simple. He is trying to muster de facto international legitimacy for the Palestinian claim that Jerusalem will be their capital. That this subterfuge is a violation of the Oslo Accords seems not to bother the leaders whom Husseini's boss, Yasser Arafat, has been assiduously courting.

Not surprisingly though, it did bother the people and the government of Israel. Interior Minister Avigdor Kahalani, has threatened to close down parts of Orient House.

It should also bother Diaspora Jewry.

Husseini's tactics are part of the battle for Jerusalem. The European Union has already pronounced its support for the idea that Jerusalem should be a corpus separatum, a separate entity.

And the Vatican has joined the Europeans, floating the idea that the Israelis and the Palestinians should accept a return to UN Resolution 181, in which pre-1948 Palestine was partitioned and post-1948 Jerusalem would be "internationalized."

Three days before the elections on May 17, we commemorate Yom Yerushalayim. Our commemorations this year should bear in mind that we, the Jews of the Diaspora, are also "foot soldiers" in that battle.

Questions right of Israel Supreme Court to overrule Knesset

Lately, The CJN has published columns and letters that are critical of Orthodox protests of the decisions of the Israel Supreme Court. The criticisms of these writers, however, cloud the issue with tendentious simplifications of the Orthodox position.

There has been no questioning of the overall legitimacy of the institution of the Supreme Court itself, but rather, protestations of the legitimacy of specific recent decisions on its part. This was the gist of the huge, yet peaceful, demonstration in Israel. Let it be noted as well, that all elements of the Orthodox world were represented there, though some seem to wish to marginalize the protests as haredi or ultra-Orthodox.

Recent Supreme Court decisions have served to undermine the religious status quo, the compromise that, since the founding of Israel, has mediated the inherent tension between a democratic state and a state that not only describes itself as a Jewish state, but also has a large minority of religious citizens.

Although Orthodox protests have been the loudest, many leading Israeli academics, journalists and Knesset members have also vociferously criticized the Israeli Supreme Court. The current justices have a ready willingness to overrule Knesset legislation and to do so in wide-ranging areas that have never been part of its jurisdiction before.

Appeals to Israel's basic laws of 1992, as if they are a constitution analogous to the Canadian charter, are misleading. The basic laws were enacted in a very modest and limited way; not with any of the formality and public debate one would expect of a major constitutional change. The sponsors of the legislation explicitly stated that the basic laws were not meant to confer new powers on the Supreme Court.

Like all legislative assemblies, the Knesset may be imperfect, but it may embody democratic values more than a Supreme Court whose bias is increasingly compromising its role as a neutral arbiter. So the question of who is undermining the rule of law in Israel is indeed the crux of the debate itself; it may not be Orthodox demonstrators who are doing so, but rather, the current justices of the Supreme Court.

Cpl. Jack Stern helped knock out tank

I'm looking for a fellow who served in the First Division, 3rd Brigade, 4th Field Engineers, RCE, who was wounded in an action in the Liri Valley near Monte Cassino in July1944.

He was Cpl. Jack Starr, nicknamed Jakie. He had teamed up with Sapper John Campbell (now of Cardston, Alta.) to poke a Bangalore Torpedo between the wheels of a Panzer that was perched on top of a hill, busy picking off our tanks.

Although wounded, Jakie and John knocked out the tank and brought back three prisoners from a nearby German bunker.

Says Harnick reneged on Zundel prosecution

I was pleased to read that Charles Harnick has decided not to run in the next provincial election (CJN, April 9). He touts all of his achievements as attorney-general from 1995 to now, but leaves out one very important failure that directly affects the Jewish community, as it does all people scarred by racism.

While in opposition from 1990-95, Harnick was the Tory critic for the attorney-general. Among the things he criticized was the attorney-general's inaction against Ernst Zundel. The provincial attorney-general has the sole responsibility and authority to permit the police to lay a charge under Canada's anti-hate legislation, which has twice been found constitutional by the Supreme Court in other cases.

During the 1995 election campaign, Harnick issued at least one piece of literature (delivered to my house) that said he would press the government to bring Zundel to trial under this law, instead of the "false news" law that, on appeal by Zundel, had been found unconstitutional by the Supreme Court. Having been made the attorney-general, and no longer just an opposition critic, Harnick reneged on his position and his promise. He has done just what his predecessors did – nothing.

No recognition for world War II Jewish vets

For the past several months, the Jewish community has been inundated with Canadian Jewish Congress espousing a Holocaust memorial in Ottawa, and FEDERATION CJA beating the drums for the new Jewish community campus.

While both projects are of importance, it is time that the Jewish community paid tribute to the 17,000 Canadian Jews who served in the armed forces so that the Holocaust could be at an end. Some 440 paid the supreme sacrifice.

Let us not forget, that it was through their sacrifices that Canadian Jewry came of age, as before World War II we Jews were held as second class citizens.

It is time that the community paid tribute to our Jewish veterans. Surely, some tangible memorial can be erected to acknowledge their sacrifices.

What is a good alternative to statehood?

By DANNY RUBINSTEIN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Some 100 members of the PLO's Central Council are convening in Gaza this week with Palestinian Authority (PA) leaders to decide what to do next week, on May 4, when the Oslo interim accords expire.

By then, PA Chairman Yasser Arafat will have returned from his world travels, Arafat deputy, Abu Mazen (Mahmud Abbas), and PA Minister of Local Government Affairs, Saeb Erekat, will have returned from Washington, where they met last week with U.S. envoy Dennis Ross in an effort to draft a letter of American guarantees to be given to Arafat in return for his refraining from declaring an independent state.

The anticipated decision of the PLO council is more or less known; it will decide that on May 4, Arafat and his spokespersons will declare that the Palestinians have the right to establish an independent state at any time they see fit and convenient to do so.

In other words, they will not declare a state, but they will also not adopt a resolution to postpone the declaration, and instead will use vague language to say they have to hang on another few weeks until the fateful date for the peace process: May 17, Israeli election day.

Arafat and his spokespersons have been explaining that their campaign to declare the establishment of a state on May 4 has already achieved results, even though no such declaration will be made.

The respective positions on Palestinian statehood of the two key prime ministerial candidates, Benjamin Netanyahu and Ehud Barak is a key issue for the Israeli electorate. Below, we see a photo of a demonstration last year in Jerusalem by Palestinians objecting to the "Juidisim (sic)" of Jerusalem. [RNS/Reuters photos]

The most important achievement is that the idea of a sovereign Palestinian state has sunk in around the world, and nothing will stop its establishment. Ostensibly, there is nothing simpler and clearer than a national movement's demand, such as the PLO's, to establish a state for its people. But that is not the case with the Palestinians.

Close inspection of the PLO's famous 1964 national charter, the underlying document of modern Palestinian nationalism, will find no mention of establishing a state. For many years, the right of return was the national goal of the Palestinians; not establishing a state, and certainly not a mini-state, only in Gaza and the West Bank.

Establishing a state in only part of Palestine was, for many years, even considered betrayal by many Palestinians, especially refugees in Lebanon and Syria.

The latter declared a day of mourning in 1988 when the Palestinian National Council (PNC) approved the Palestinian declaration of independence at the famous Algiers meeting. In the future, as well, when Arafat declares the establishment of a sovereign Palestinian state in the West Bank and Gaza, there will be considerable opposition to it from refugees who will no doubt understand that this entails a kind of waiving of their right to return to their land and homes inside Israeli territory.

In other words, the demand to establish a Palestinian national state has, in recent years, replaced the demand to obtain the right of return, and that is the important political revolution to which Arafat has led his movement.

In this respect, at least, Israel should not oppose the establishment of a Palestinian state and should even support it, as maintained by Shimon Peres, whose voice and that of his colleagues has disappeared in the election campaign.

Continued rule by Israel the only option

The thought of what will happen in Israel, if a Palestinian state is not established, is frightening. The only alternative to not establishing a Palestinian state is continued rule by Israeli occupation, directly and indirectly, over large areas of the West Bank and Gaza.

All of the security risks that Israel will, indeed, encounter after the establishment of a Palestinian state are not worth the loathsome situation that the Jewish state will inevitably fall into if a Palestinian-Arab state is not established alongside it. And this week in Gaza, the PLO's Central Council will pass a resolution in principle to establish it.

A Jewish children's museum

I am an old museum buff, but I have never seen anything like this. I was amazed when the literature I received at this museum said that there are over 250 children's museums around the world, and that their number has doubled during the last decade.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Just what is an up-to-date children's museum? I learned that while adult museums teach through the use of information labels, these newcomers use things like toys, games, costumes, a playhouse, interactive exhibitions, hands-on activities, intergenerational learning, or special programs such as storytelling, sing-alongs or puppet shows. It all amounts to learning and fun, intertwined.

The place of my discovery was not the downtown general children's museum, but My Jewish Discovery Place, tucked away in a corner of the Bathurst Jewish Centre in Toronto. It is the first of its kind in Canada, and the second in North America.

Director Katya Rudzik, a native Torontonian, got the inspiration when she visited the Los Angeles Jewish children's museum, and last October, with the help of the centre's director, Deborah Pinsky, was able to create this addition to the Jewish world of wonders.

The few months it has been opened, it has attracted over 4,000 visitors, and the director hopes to reach the 5,000 mark in the near future. Visiting hours on Sundays had to be extended so that children of supplementary schools of the city's synagogues might have an opportunity to take a field trip.

I was delighted to see this latest voyage into the expanding field of Jewish education. Rudzik describes the program as filling a void by being "fresh, young and fun." Children and parents come, but not merely to look; they participate. At Purim time, they can dress up in the costume they wish. At Pesach time, they have an opportunity to set the festive table. Further exhibits explore Jewish music and dance, stories and folk tales, mitzvot, the Hebrew language, Israel, Shabbat and more.

The exhibits change regularly, and their weekly, annual and special programs are designed to transform visitors into participants, and offer adults and children a unique opportunity to jointly discover the wonders of our Jewish heritage.

The themes of My Jewish Discovery Place are universal. The underlying message of each exhibit relays basic moral and ethical essence, while attempting to promote understanding and respect within our differences. In the process, it is hoped the visitors of all ages will be led to understand themselves a little better.

The ages to which the museum appeals range from two to eight years. Facilitators and volunteer docents encourage, guide, mediate and support the unique experiences of each visitor.

Altogether, it is a wonderful addition to our Canadian Jewish experience, and hopefully other cities will soon follow. I hear that the interest in Montreal is already quite high.

There is a small entrance fee, and the membership in a program is available as well. It's a place to which I would gladly take my great-grandchildren, if I had any.

Getting a higher education

I am amazed at the amount of useless knowledge that I can fit into my head. I can recite tidbits of information that would only be useful for multiple choice exam questions or while playing along with Jeopardy at home.

Jennifer Fox in Halifax

As I write this column, I should be studying for my last exam of the 1998-99 school year. My exam for an English course on plays in the tragedy genre is supposed to test my ability to analyze and synthesize the material studied for the last eight months. On the whole, however, it will consist of nothing more than regurgitation of inane details.

This leaves me with a quandary. What's the point of it all? In 10 years, six months or the minute after I finish the exam, will it really matter who killed who in a 17th-century revenge play?

The point of higher education is twofold. Firstly, I'm there to learn. By learning I mean not the ability to crank out dates, names and plot synopses, but the ability to take thoughts of those before me and mold them into a thought of my own.

That's the general argument for having a liberal arts degree. It teaches you how to think and to see more than what's on the page. This is why I've always enjoyed English or social science classes.

The need to improve someone's ability to think and analyze leads into the second goal of university and college – finding a job.

Luckily for me, I knew the answer to the sentence, "When I grow up I want to be a..." since I was 13. I don't know how, but I decided upon "journalist," and picked a university that would help me achieve my chosen career. But the elementary school statement "when I grow up" means that eventually I have to grow up.

After this exam, I will have completed my second year of my degree. Two years down, two to go. This means in a mere 104 weeks, I will be thrust from the secure setting of the academic world into the reality of the job force.

Naturally, this upcoming event preys on my mind. For the last 16 years all I've ever been is a student. That's it. I know tests, assignments and summer vacations. It's familiar and I'm good at it. Am I willing to give up the life I've always known for tax deductions and RSP contributions? I don't think I'm ready to be all grown up just yet.

If the purpose of my four years at King's College (and the large sums of money given to the bursar's office) is to educate and prepare me for my transition into the world beyond the picturesque quad and the neoclassical buildings, then why do I need to know so much trivial information?

Whether or not I can name the two sons of Oedipus will make no difference to me when I'm writing a story about a recent robbery or election. No one will care that I can list Aristotle's six parts of tragic action. And if in a middle of an interview, the person turns to me and demands to know the year Shakespeare wrote Macbeth, I will be the most shocked of all.

I came to school with the expectation of expanding my mind. I also came with the hope that along the way I would evolve into a full-fledged adult. This means doing things I don't want to do, including answering obvious questions for marks and filling my head with facts I'll never need again.

This means I should stop whining and go study. On the plus side, I'm very good at Trivial Pursuit.

Montreal's Jewish future

At Hillel, students have taken the initiative to guide Judaism into the 21st century.

Being involved at Hillel, the Jewish student centre at McGill University, I have observed and have assisted with the rebirth and revival of Jewish student life on campus.

Erica Horn in Montreal

Hillel members have begun to realize that they are the keys to the Jewish future in Montreal. And, perhaps most importantly (in terms of our existence), the staff has come to that same realization.

There is no doubt that without Jews in my age group deciding to live and stay in Montreal, the future of the Montreal Jewish community seems grim. Hillel, therefore, has willingly taken on the burdensome task of helping to lay the foundations for a future they hope will be bright.

By the same token, Hillel could and would not exist unless there were students wanting to be involved and who were conscious of the weight of the future put on their shoulders.

In many regards it seems to me that Hillel's existence is often taken for granted by members of our community.

While time and time again, we are forced to campaign for extravagant amounts of money to accomplish our far-reaching goals, other agencies targeting a similar population are holding seemingly token events to encourage us to stay in Montreal.

Admittedly the odd party is a good way to meet those with whom we must build our future and it is undoubtedly an easy way to socialize. However, truth be told, a simple stroll down St. Laurent on a Saturday night or a trip through the Cavendish Mall will achieve the same purpose.

Moreover, if the reason some people decide to stay in Montreal is due to an annual party in October where they are guaranteed to run into 100 or so Jews, then I suggest that they get their heads checked.

Students are often criticized for being idealists and always in search of a good party. I cannot contradict either assertion.

Idealism is the only way that we can hope to achieve our goals, and parties are fun social events. However, students have other interests besides dressing up and seeing their friends.

They are demonstrating a commitment, not only to a fruitful social life in Montreal, but perhaps to something more meaningful, more representative of the long-term goals for our community. Such commitment, in my opinion, encourages people to stay.

Guest lecturers, student activism on campuses and fundraisers that encourage the involvement of students, highlight the necessity of our participation. Activities such as these, which show us that we are good for more than just our socialization skills, are bound to reap more benefits than the odd party.

The Jewish Renaissance witnessed at Hillel has been overwhelming.

We accomplished more in the month of March than agencies with more funds and personnel have achieved in a school year. Art Spiegelman, cartoonist and author of Pulitzer-Prize-winning Maus, visited Montreal through Hillel's initiative.

The Purim party was a smashing success – and I know this because the bar was filled to capacity and I couldn't even get in to count the number of people there.

Hillel was actively involved with the Wake-Up tour and Stay-Up program, innumerable Shabbatons, an inter-CEGEP party, a basketball tournament, a scratch-card fundraiser, a chocolate seder and the ongoing protest against Concordia University's decision to bring Norman Finkelstein, an anti-Zionist and anti-Semitic Jew to speak on a Friday night. Is that enough for one month? We could have done more.

Tooting one's own horn is a bad trait – I know. However, I speak on behalf of all the students involved at Hillel.

We are the future and as idealistic as we may be, we need more than parties to keep us going. We need to see that our community trusts us.

The Jews of Palestine and the Holocaust

The past two decades have seen an explosion of interest in Holocaust studies. Much of the new research has naturally focused on Europe, the scene of the unspeakable crimes. But in line with this trend, Israeli historians, from Dina Porat to Tom Segev, have begun to take a closer look at the Yishuv – the Jewish community in Palestine – during this critical period.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Two of the most recent works of this genre, both of which are diligently researched and well worth reading, are The Yishuv in the Shadow of the Holocaust (Westview Press) by Abraham Edelheit and Ben-Gurion and the Holocaust (Harcourt Brace) by Shabtai Teveth.

Edelheit's book offers a cogent analysis of the Yishuv's response to the imperative of saving European Jewry between 1933 and 1939, an era which encompasses Adolf Hitler's accession to power and the outbreak of World War II. Teveth's work debunks the argument that David Ben-Gurion, the pre-eminent Zionist leader in Palestine, was insufficiently militant in responding to the unfolding tragedy.

The rise of a rabidly anti-Semitic regime in Germany was considered worthy of extensive coverage by the Hebrew press in Palestine, Edelheit observes. Virtually all the newspapers devoted increasingly large amounts of precious space to describing and analysing the menacing events in Germany.

In May 1933, just four months after Hitler's appointment as chancellor and only a month after the first Nazi-orchestrated economic boycott against Jewish merchants throughout Germany, the Jewish leadership in Palestine issued a manifesto calling on the world to help and defend German Jewry.

Beyond that plea for assistance, the Yishuv embarked on a concrete program of rescue aliyah. From 1933 to 1937, for example, 174,803 Jewish immigrants reached Palestine, of whom 39,324 hailed from Germany. Considerable numbers of olim also poured out of Poland, Romania, Latvia and Lithuania.

Despite strident calls for an economic boycott of Germany, the Yishuv adopted a practical (and expedient) approach to the issue. In August 1933, following negotiations between Jewish officials and Germany's consul general in Jerusalem, a mutually beneficial agreement was reached that allowed German olim to bring with them to Palestine manufactured goods and raw materials.

The accord was morally controversial and broke the back of the international boycott against Germany, but it encouraged aliyah and provided the Yishuv with the wherewithal for further expansion and growth, Edelheit notes.

Similar agreements were signed with Latvia and Lithuania in March and April 1936. Talks with Poland began in the same year, but failed to produce a deal. Zionist negotiators claimed that the Poles did not negotiate in good faith.

Finally, Edelheit examines the Yishuv's position toward the White Paper, which limited Jewish immigration and acquisition of land. Issued in May 1939, the White Paper was a stinging repudiation of the 1917 Balfour Declaration and a litmus test of Zionist intentions with respect to Britain.

With the White Paper, Britain essentially bought Arab support (or at least their neutrality) in any upcoming European war. On the other hand, the Yishuv's support was assured by virtue of Jewish animosity to Germany.

The Brits, of course, were right. The struggle against the White Paper was delayed by the war. On Sept. 3, 1939, in a rhetorical flourish, Ben-Gurion declared: "We shall fight Hitler as though there were no White Paper, and we shall fight the White paper as though there was no Hitler."

Considering the dire circumstances, did Ben-Gurion really have a viable alternative?

When the Holocaust was at its height, Ben-Gurion and his closest associates were accused not only of indifference to the fate of European Jews but of actual responsibility for their deaths through collaboration with the Nazis. According to the critics, Ben-Gurion cut deals with the Nazis that enabled selected Zionist Jews to escape to Palestine, leaving the rest to their fate.

Teveth, however, believes that he exerted ceaseless efforts to save Jews caught in the web of the Nazi occupation. Describing him as a pragmatist and a visionary, Teveth says that Ben-Gurion was an ardent believer in the concept of the ingathering of the Jews in their ancestral homeland. Ben-Gurion, therefore, sought with every fibre of his being to bring Jews to Palestine.

Why, then, has Ben-Gurion been castigated? Teveth lists two reasons.

In his public appearances, he generally kept his feelings to himself. But in times of national crisis, people expect a leader to articulate their horror and sorrow.

Ben-Gurion, too, recognized that very little rescue could be achieved while a fierce war was raging. Teveth subscribes to this view. "The tragic fact is – and about this there is a consensus among the first rank of Holocaust historians, as well as among many of the survivors – that no matter how much effort Zionism and the Yishuv might have invested in the attempt, only a very few more Jews could have been rescued."

Nonetheless, Ben-Gurion did not wash his hands of rescue, and continued working on behalf of Jews trapped behind enemy lines. Indeed, it was Ben-Gurion who demanded a study of "any proposal that offers even the slightest hope for rescuing Jews from the Nazi inferno."

In closing, Teveth makes two more telling points. British policies and restrictions constrained rescue efforts, and Allied war aims ruled out any massive rescue plans.

Need more be said?

Ruthless killers

Before Auschwitz and before the Nazis' systematic extermination of European Jewry, cavalcades of ruthless killers, known collectively as Einsatzgruppen, hunted down and murdered Jews in cold blood by the thousands in the Soviet Union.

They perpetrated their crimes in relative secrecy, often with the assistance of local collaborators. Their targets were primarily helpless, hapless Jewish civilians. They embarked on their killing spree in June 1941, following Germany's invasion of the Soviet Union. In their first massive act of mass destruction, they slaughtered 34,000 Jewish civilians at Babi Yar in September 1941.

The four Einsatzgruppen units ranged far and wide, from the Baltic to the Black Sea, working hand in glove with the regular German army. They were true believers, being of the view that Jews were subhumans, vermin who had to be wiped off the face of the earth.

By the time they were through with their grisly task, unprecedented in the annals of history, they had killed approximately one million Jews, primarily in the Baltic republics, Belarus, Russia and Ukraine.

If not for the persistence of an American Jewish lawyer, Benjamin Ferencz, these murderers might have eluded justice. Shortly after the war, Ferencz – the subject of a recent A&E television documentary entitled The Nazis' Secret Killing Squads – stumbled upon Einsatzgruppen records in Berlin. He persuaded Telford Taylor, the chief prosecutor at the Nuremberg trials, to bring the Einsatzgruppen leaders to trial.

The proceedings began on Sept. 29, 1947 and ended on April 10, 1948. The 22 accused, some of whom were highly educated, claimed in self-defence that Jews posed a mortal threat to Germany. Their plea fell on deaf ears. Four were hanged and the rest were given long prison sentences.

Biblical history

The Oxford History of the Biblical World*, edited by M.D. Coogan (Oxford University Press $79.95).

Books
Bernard Baskin

The 24 books of the Hebrew Bible were composed over a long period of time. The epic sweep of biblical history, from the time of Abraham to the Babylonian Exile, covers approximately 1,500 years.

Biblical writers were profoundly affected by the cyclical rise and fall of a long succession of imperial powers: Egypt, Assyria, Babylon, Persia, Greece and Rome.

Unfortunately, ancient Israel was dangerously positioned between the major powers of the time. Except for a few decades during the reigns of David and Solomon, ancient Israel, a strategic land bridge joining Asia to Africa, was continually trampled on by other nations.

Domination by often hostile neighbors gave biblical writers their distinctive outlook on history and uncertainty about the will and intentions of their God.

The book under review, a composite work by a group of acknowledged scholars, explores the background of the Hebrew scriptures.

It starts with the Bronze Age, accounts of Creation and the Patriarchs of Israel, and continues through the tumultuous period of the Kingdom and the Exile.

Several final chapters deal with the shifting fortunes of Jews and Christians in the Hellenistic and Roman worlds.

Bringing to bear the latest findings in archeology and biblical research, the contributors, in chronologically ordered chapters, provide information on the arts, architecture, languages, economic conditions, literature and religion of a variety of Middle Eastern cultures and civilizations.

Harry Orlinsky, the renowned Bible scholar once wrote, "It is now possible to see the entire ancient Near East from a thoroughly new perspective, and so it has become necessary to re-examine the biblical record in the light of our broadened understanding."

He emphasized, however, that by and large the biblical accounts are more likely to be true than false – unless clear-cut evidence from sources outside the Bible demonstrate the reverse.

The essays contain a multitude of insights and much striking information, of which the following two examples are typical.

In discussing the Exodus from Egypt, the Bible indicates that a mixed crowd, made up of 600,000 men and their families, left Egypt with a lot of livestock.

One scholar points out that if all the 2.5 million people in such a group "marched 10 abreast, the resulting line of more than 150 miles would need eight or nine days to march past any single fixed point.

"Taken at face value, such a host could not have crossed any ordinary stretch of water by any ordinary road or path in one night; nor could these numbers, or anything remotely approaching them, have been sustained in the inhospitable Sinai desert ... The entire population of Egypt in the mid-13th century BCE has been estimated at 2.8 million."

The Bible indicates that two gigantic pillars stood at the entrance of the Temple in Jerusalem, each of them 33 feet high. They carried the enigmatic names Jachin and Boaz.

"As freestanding columns, they flanked the building's forecourt, just as pillars marked the monumental gateways of sacred precincts throughout the ancient Near East.

"Carved reliefs of such gateways show that the completion of a temple was marked by a grand procession and celebration... The highly visible pillars – the only elaborately decorated element in the otherwise plain exterior of the Temple – therefore communicated the presence of Israel's God to all onlookers."

This handsome, large format, volume of 672 pages is enhanced with nearly 200 illustrations, many of them in color. Some of the articles, or a portion of them, are detailed and scholarly and not easy reading, but, all in all, this is perhaps the best one-volume work on a subject of unending interest and importance.

More Israeli election sites

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Last week, we began our look at some of the Web sites trying to woo and inform Israeli voters as the May 17 elections approach. Today, some of the sites belonging to the political parties. Please note that this is not a comprehensive look at party ideologies but a guide to where you can learn more. All the sites are in English or bilingual unless otherwise mentioned.

As I mentioned, you should start your search at the Jerusalem Post – Elections 1999 site [http://www.jpost.co.il/Info/Elections99/index.shtml]. Anyone mystified by the mechanics and rhetoric of the election will enjoy this primer.

When you look at Moledet's home page, you'll not only find three Israeli flags but the lyrics to Hatikvah, too [http://www.moledet.org.il/]. The Hebrew-only site includes photos of party leaders along with the party platform. ("The Land of Israel belongs to the Jewish people and only to the Jewish people.") For more (in Hebrew), see the Yedioth Aharonot site [http://www.elections-yedioth.co.il/Articles/506.htm].

Yossi Sarid's Meretz [http://www.meretz.israel.net/], the democratic party of Israel, believes in what it calls "the right to live without religious coercion." It had nine members in the previous Knesset under the leadership of Yossi Sarid. You can find more in Hebrew at the Yedioth site [http://www.elections-yedioth.co.il/Articles/507.htm].

Shinui [http://www.shinui.org.il/] calls itself "the only active liberal party in Israel [which] finds its ideological position at the centre of the political map." It supports the peace process and the Oslo agreement, wants a free market economy based on liberal principals, and believes Israel should be a democratic state. Shinui is currently represented in the Knesset by Avraham Poraz.

I couldn't find an official site for some prominent parties. You can find background on Agudat Yisrael at the Jewish Student Online Research Centre [http://www.us-israel.org/jsource/Politics/aguddat.html].

Yisrael b'Aliyah made an impact on the Israeli political landscape in 1996 when the party won seven seats. You can find a brief profile of party leader Natan Sharansky at the Israel Ministry of Foreign Affairs site [http://www.israel.org/mfa/go.asp?MFAH00gc0] and more in Hebrew at Yedioth [http://www.elections-yedioth.co.il/Articles/472.htm].

Finally, here are a couple of parties you may not have heard of. Ale-Yarok (The Green Leaf Party) [http://ale-yarok.org.il/] supports the use of marijuana for medical, industrial, agricultural and environmental purposes.

And then there's Pnina Rosenblum [http://www.rosenblum.inter.net.il/]. When you go to her Web site, you may do a double-take. It is very pink. The Jerusalem Post says that although most of the media are treating Rosenblum's candidacy as a joke, "the former blonde bombshell turned cosmetics queen" has articulated policies (pro Oslo; maximum sentences for perpetrators of domestic violence [http://www.jpost.com/com/Archive/31.Jan.1999/Features/Article-18.html]). And "as a potential Knesset member, she's a lot more genuine than her blonde locks – and many of her fellow candidates."

Next week, Labor, Likud and other parties and platforms.

Jewish Life

Literary void exists

By AVI BENLOLO

A quick search of the catalogue of most Canadian libraries would reveal very few books and journal articles that document the life and history of Sephardim in Canada.

This is a tragic state for an ethnic community that settled in Canada prior to Confederation, that built one of the oldest synagogues in Canada – the Spanish and Portuguese Synagogue in Montreal – and has developed numerous synagogues and schools throughout the country.

There is a negative and a positive side to this literary void. On one hand, the lack of academic work in this area provides an opportunity for aspiring researchers. The study of Sephardi Jewry in Canada is a good topic for those searching for a relatively uncharted area in Canadian academia.

On the other hand, students and academics studying the Canadian Jewish experience need to dig deep to find out about the existence of Sephardim in Canada. Moreover, since sources are rare, attaining a full and accurate picture of Sephardi life is difficult because of the limited information available.

Still, there are a few Canadian thinkers who have taken the time to examine the Canadian Sephardi experience, although in some cases, they have been too focused on the Sephardi-Ashkenazi relationship.

Sarah Taib-Carlen presents, perhaps, the most comprehensive account of Toronto's Sephardi Jewry. Her 1989 dissertation titled Assessment of a Small Group Ethnic Identity: The Jews in North Africa and the North African Jews in Toronto covers an expanse of Sephardi life.

Taib-Carlen discusses issues relating to Sephardi origins, family structure, customs, religious beliefs, ethnicity, ethnic identity and Sephardi-Ashkenazi relations.

In another article titled Sephardim and Ashkenazim in Montreal, Jean-Claude Lasry looks at the linguistic differences that have distanced these groups. He found that rather than assimilating with the established Anglo-Jewish community, French speaking Sephardim integrated into Francophone society, and they were especially motivated by Quebec nationalism.

As a result of linguistic differences, Elazar and Miller contend in their 1990 book, Maintaining Consensus, that North African Jews are in the "anomalous" position of speaking the language of the majority, but forming part of a religious minority. Interestingly enough, Daniel Elazar and Harold Miller devote very few pages of their book to Canadian Sephardim, and in these pages, they mostly deal with the Sephardi-Ashkenazi relationship.

It is in my opinion that future academic work on Sephardi Jews in Canada must break free from the Sephardi-Ashkenazi quagmire. Academics and others have been too focused on this issue for too long.

Surely, there are other issues that can and need to be discussed, such as immigration, demographics, assimilation, ethnic mobility, integration into communal structures, religious movements and the Sephardi relationship with Israel.

As Canadian Sephardi communities begin to mature, and the second generation firmly takes its place in the academic, professional and communal world, I suspect new research will emerge which will engage the Sephardi experience in Canada in a much more comprehensive way.

The Burgenland collection

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

For more than a decade, an Israeli archivist has been asking Austrian officials to return to Jewish hands, a large archival collection that once belonged to the Jewish communities of Burgenland, a former region of Hungary that is now the easternmost province of Austria.

According to Hadassah Assouline, director of the Jerusalem-based Central Archives for the History of the Jewish People, the disputed collection occupies about 40 metres of shelf space in a regional archives in Eisenstadt. Assouline made an extensive inventory of its contents in 1988.

The material, which dates from the late 17th to the 20th century, includes Jewish communal record books (pinkassim), burial society records, and school, military, metrical and tax lists.

Also included are rabbinical correspondence and numerous letters between Jewish communal figures and the Esterhazy family of Eisenstadt, the longstanding patrons and protectors of Burgenland's Jews.

Assouline points out that the collection, which Austrian archivists salvaged from the Nazis, is "stolen Jewish property."

She says: "This is property belonging to the Jews of Burgenland and under normal circumstances it never would have left their possession."

Famed for its well-known "seven communities" with their illustrious rabbis and yeshivot, Burgenland was an important centre of Austro-Hungarian Jewish life from about 1690 until September 1938, when the Nazis expelled the Jews and declared 10 cities, including Eisenstadt, to be "Judenrein."

The Central Archives for the History of the Jewish People is an independent government-funded institution situated on the Givat Ram campus of Hebrew University. Since 1969, it has built one of the most extensive collections of documents pertaining to the Jews of the Diaspora, from the Middle Ages to the present day.

Regarding the Burgenland collection, Assouline emphasizes that it did not originate as government material. "It belonged to the Jewish community, which was a private organization," she says. "The community was never obliged to deposit any of this material with the regional or state government."

When the collection resurfaced after the war in regional archives in Eisenstadt, the Jewish community in Vienna – legal heir to all Jewish communities of Austria – requested its return, but to no avail. A request from an organization of Burgenland Jews in Israel was also unsuccessful.

Since the early 1980s, Assouline has persuaded successive Israeli ambassadors to Austria to raise the matter with the Austrians.

While the Austrian government has maintained that the issue is a regional, rather than a federal matter, officials of the regional archives in Eisenstadt have asserted that they cannot legally repatriate the material to Israel.

In 1986, the chief of the Burgenland archives agreed to microfilm much of the collection and ship it to Jerusalem on an open-ended "long-term loan." Microfilming occurred in 1994, but the archives subsequently refused to relinquish the material on loan as agreed.

Attempting to break the bureaucratic logjam, U.S. Senator Frank Lautenberg wrote last winter to the Austrian embassy in Washington, asking for help "to bring this matter to a satisfactory close."

Assouline remains adamant that the collection must eventually be given back to the Jewish people. "This material chronicles a very important chapter of our history," she says. "It's no less valuable than bank accounts, buildings, art, or any other type of stolen Jewish property. It must be returned to us."

Author offers shocking look at world's hidden history

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — John Loftus hasn't changed his speech much over the past few years, but his discussion of the world of international intrigue, spying, subterfuge and betrayal still packs a powerful punch.

Last week, the author of The Secret War Against the Jews received a standing ovation from an appreciative audience who'd travelled to The Old Mill in Etobicoke to hear him speak at an Aish HaTorah program commemorating Israeli Independence Day.

Loftus had them gasping with shock at his revelations that U.S. and British intelligence agencies spy on each others' Jewish communities and trade the information, so they can deny they spied domestically. They shook their heads when he described how western governments welcomed Nazi collaborators to their shores as part of a planned anti-Communist army.

He also stunned onlookers with his claim that U.S. intelligence intercepted a 1973 Arab cable and knew of the planned Yom Kippur attack four days before Egypt and Syria surprised Israel – but did not tell the Israelis about it.

A Justice Department lawyer in the late 1970s, Loftus began his work investigating the world's "hidden history" almost by accident. He had joined a unit that was investigating the presence of Nazis in the United States, and was assigned the less than glamorous task of poring through the U.S. archives in Maryland. One day he got lost in the massive, one-acre subterranean vaults and came upon files that had been marked classified until 2015.

Reading the files, he learned that after World War II, Britain, Canada and the United States were already making contingency plans for World War III against the Soviet Union. They devised a scheme to bring Eastern European anti-communists to the west, and train them as an underground army that would be sent back in the event of war.

Unfortunately, the program was supervised by British agent Kim Philby, who was the highest ranking Soviet spy in Western intelligence. Instead of bringing freedom fighters to the west, "he sent the dregs of the Nazi war criminals of Eastern Europe," Loftus said.

"It wasn't hard to find Nazis in Toronto," Loftus said. "They were everywhere."

Loftus publicized his U.S. findings on 60 Minutes. The revelations shocked the American public. "Mike Wallace got the Emmy Award, my family got the death threats," he said.

Afterwards, he went into private law practice, but intelligence agents continually sought him out and fed him all sorts of juicy information.

"They taught me a lot about how the world really works," Loftus said.

Among his revelations:

• Churchill and Roosevelt knew about the Nazi massacre of Jews as early as September 1941. Roosevelt proposed calling on Hitler to release the Jews, but Churchill did not want to anger the Arabs by admitting Jews to Palestine, while the United States and Canada had a closed door policy to Jewish refugees. Roosevelt backtracked on condition Britain agreed to the prosecution of Nazi war criminals after the war.

• Zionist leaders "blackmailed" Nelson Rockefeller to get his co-operation in the UN vote for the creation of Israel. Rockefeller, who was serving as head of the CIA for Latin America at the time, had done business with the Nazis through Swiss companies. The Zionists threatened to expose those links if he didn't help them get the Latin American votes Israel needed. He agreed on condition Israel not establish a unit to hunt for Nazis, who Rockefeller knew were coming to South America in great numbers. "It was a devil's bargain, but Ben-Gurion agreed to it," Loftus said.

• Though he hated Hitler, Pope Pius XII, along with a small group of anti-communist Italian clerics, set up a network to smuggle Nazis out of Europe after the war.

• British intelligence wire-tapped King Edward, and learned he was sympathetic to the Nazis. He was forced to abdicate, not because of marriage to an American divorcee, but because he was willing to make back door deals with Hitler.

• Despite possessing intelligence indicating the planned October 1973 attack on Israel, chief U.S. foreign policy adviser Henry Kissinger withheld the information. "We wanted to let Israel bleed a little but come out ahead" Loftus explained. Through re-supply of ammunition, the United States would get the leverage to coerce Israel into accepting its plans for a comprehensive Mideast peace.

However, the war went very badly for Israel, and the Jewish state was in real danger until Gen. Alexander Haig, then serving as White House Chief of Staff, arranged to supply Israel with the then-new TOW anti-tank missiles. Israel used them on Egyptian armor with devastating success, he said.

• Britain and the United States started tapping the phone lines of Jews in the United States, Britain and Canada even before World War II ended. They were concerned that Jews would attempt to supply the Jews of Palestine with arms.

Meanwhile, Lev Hoch, a Czech Jew who had infiltrated British intelligence, learned of a British plot to overthrow the democratic, leftist government of Czechoslovakia, and instal a right wing one with some fascist elements. He informed the Czechs, and received in exchange cooperation in selling arms to Israel. It was those arms that turned the tide in Israel's War of Independence.

That Czech Jew later changed his name to Robert Maxwell and became an international publisher.

"No matter what he had done later in his life, in his youth Maxwell had saved a nation," Loftus said.

Loftus said he was motivated to investigate the world's unseen history as a result of a friendship he had developed with a Holocaust survivor.

תרבות דרעי, 1999:

הרשעתו של אריה דרעי בעבירות שוחד אישיות איננה מיוחדת כל כך, כי היא אירעה כבר בעבר לפוליטיקאים. הדבר המיוחד בפרשה הזו נעוץ לדעתי בעובדה שלמרות שנשלח לארבע שנות מאסר, קיים ציבור של כרבע מליון איש,כולל רבנים מכובדים, שאינם מקבלים את פסיקת בית המשפט וממשיכים לראות בו גיבור לאומי ומנהיג שאינו ניתן להחלפה. הם אומרים בריש גלי: יש בית משפט של מטה, ויש בית משפט של מעלה (ענו האל בכבודו ובעצמו),והאל הוא לצידו של דרעי. הם גם אומרים: האיש הזה עזר לנו, ואם חלק מהכספים שהועברו דרכו מצאו את דרכם לביסו - מותר לו. לשון אחרת: זה שהוא מרמה את המדינה זה בסדר, כל זמן שהוא משלנו ועוזר לנו. יש בכך ביטוי בוטה לתהום עמוקה בין שתי תרבויות מאוד שונות. התהום הזו חזקה מההבדלים שבין דתיים וחילוניים, בין מזרחיים ואשכנזים, יהודים וערבים. זהו כיום, לדעתי קו השבר החזק ביותר בישראל. זה לא אומר כמובן שבעוד חודש חודשיים לא יווצר קו שבר חדש, לאורך עקרונות אחרים. אבל חזון למועד.

פרופ' חיים רויפמן - בודד בצמרת:

חודש מאי 1999 הוא ללא ספק החודש של חיים רויפמן, רופא ילדים וחוקר בעל שם בינלאומי בבית החולים לילדים של טורונטו. חיים, שמנהל את המחלקה לאימונולוגיה (תורת החיסון) בבית החולים, זכה בפרס היוקרתי ביותר שמעניק ע"י אגודת חוקרי רפואת הילדים על הישגיו בהבנת המנגנון שבו מגן הגוף על עצמו נגד זיהומים וגורמים חיצוניים אחרים. עבודות המחקר של פרופ' רויפמן פורסמו בעיתוני המחקר היוקרתיים ביותר בעולם וזכו להד ופרסום עצומים. הוא מוזמן דרך קבע להרצות במיטב האוניברסיטאות בעולם. מלבד ההכרה הבינלאומית העצומה בעיקבות הפרס, שינתן לחיים במעמד של אלפי רופאים בסן פרנסיסקו, הוא גם זוכה בפרס כספי ניכר. ובאילו זה לא מספיק, לקראת סוף החודש תוענק לפרופ. רויפמן קתדרא מטעם אוניברסיטת טורונטו ובית החולים לילדים של טורונטו. זוהי הכרה מאוד יוקרתית בהישגיו של חיים, ומלבד הכבוד - מדובר בתרומה של 2 מליון דולאר לטובת תוכנית המחקר שלו.

משהו טוב באמת:

בישראל פתחו במתקפה רבתי להורדת מספר תאונות הדרכים: השותפות, בנוסף למשרד התחבורה, הן מע"צ, המשטרה, הרשויות המקומיות ומשרדי החינוך והבריאות. והינה, עוד התוכנית בחיתוליה, חלה ירידה של כ - 25 אחוזים במספר התאונות עם נפגעים ברבעון הראשון של 99 לעומת 98, וירידה של 30% במספר ההרוגים. קשה לדעת אם זה מקרי, או שינוי בגישה, או הישגים אמיתיים של התוכנית החדשה. בכל מקרה - זהו משהו טוב באמת. דבר אחד אני יכול להעיד אחרי שבוע של נהיגה בישראל באפריל 99: אינני רואה שיפור ב"כמעט תאונות" שנובעות מאופי הנהיגה הישראלי. זהו משהו משהו! הסיכונים שבני אדם מוכנים לקחת בשביל כלום! אבל שישאר בינינו.

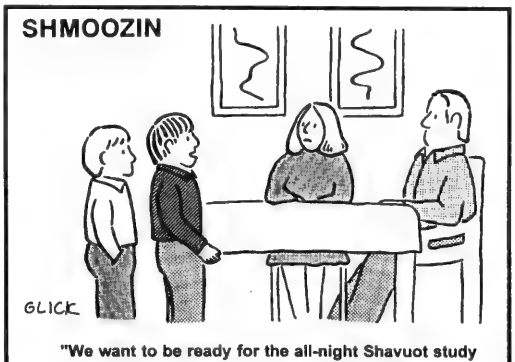
BEVERLY HILLS CATERERS AT LE PARC. THE TRADITION CONTINUES.



Mohel's dream comes true with day of multiple brits

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Performing a brit milah, a ritual circumcision, is considered a mitzvah in Jewish tradition, so imagine the joy in being able to perform five mitzvot in a single day.

Rochelle Schwartz was kvelling in the aftermath of her mitzvah-filled experience in which she performed "brits" on triplets in the morning and twins in the afternoon.

"It was a wonderful day," Schwartz said later. "It was a mohel's dream to do a triplets bris and twins. I feel like it was the greatest mitzvah of my life. I'm glad God chose me to carry out this wonderful mitzvah."

A doctor in family practice for 14 years, Schwartz had performed circumcisions for many of her non-Jewish patients when she decided to do Jewish ritual circumcisions.

After studying with Rabbi Daniel Komito-Gottlieb of Temple Kol Ami, Schwartz was certified by the Berit Milah Board of Reform Judaism in November 1997, becoming one of only two female mohelets in Canada. (A third is now studying for certification in Ottawa.)

Schwartz has been performing brits for a little over one year though she's performed circumcisions for her non-Jewish patients for 14 years.

Before officiating at a Jewish tradition as ancient as Abraham, Schwartz begins the day with a tradition of her own. As she has done before most momentous events in her life, from getting married to writing a med-school exam, she visited her father, Harry, a kohen, to receive his blessing.

"I would not do anything without my father's blessing," she said.

He in turn, remembers being blessed by his father before him. "He said he always felt safe" when he received the blessing. "It's something that's passed down through the generations," Schwartz said.

After receiving her blessing, Schwartz's next stop was at the home where Ali and Philip Offman and their three boys, Corey, Ryan and Jordan, awaited her.

Ali, a nurse in Schwartz's Thornhill medical office, gave birth in late January, but the "brits" had to wait until the boys grew larger and stronger, Schwartz explained.

A stickler for preparation and organization, Schwartz had visited the family beforehand to discuss the service and handle all arrangements. Three pillows had been set up, along with three Kiddush cups and three sets of instruments.

Traditional in many ways, Schwartz has modified her circumcision procedures in the last three years to make the experience as comfortable for the boys as possible. One hour before the service, they are given Tylenol while 10 minutes before, they are injected with a pain medication, a dorsal penile block, which freezes the area.

Add that to the gauze dipped in wine and sugar, which is given to the boys to suck on, and it "helps to control the pain," she said. "Usually they don't cry and if they don't, I say it's a woman's touch."

After enjoying some bagels and lox, Schwartz departed for her second appointment, at the Holy Blossom Temple, where Laura and Brian Dallal-McLean were waiting with their twins, Benjamin Alan and Nethaniel Steven.

The second set of "brits" had a distinctively Middle Eastern flavor to them, thanks to the Dallal family's Iraqi origins.

Naim Dallal, the papa, as the grandfather is called in the Sephardi community, served as sandak, and recited a special prayer for that role. The boys were each seated in a velvet-covered wooden Elijah's chair that belongs to the Iraqi Jewish Association and which is used in brit ceremonies. The prophet Elijah is said to presage the coming of the Messiah and the chair is brought for him in the hope that the baby may be the long-awaited Messiah, Schwartz explained.

Ali Offman (right) hands one of her sons to Rochelle Schwartz for a brit milah.

Six candles were lit by female friends and relatives of the families and they recited Shehechianu.

The service was also punctuated by lots of singing and ululating.

A green myrtle branch was also used, as it is in many happy occasions in Iraq, Dallal said.

Harriet Schachter, for one, was very impressed with the service Schwartz conducted. One of the triplets' grandmothers, she said it was the first time she'd seen a woman serve as mohel. "It was just beautiful. No one could have done it better. It was personal, interesting, very moving. It was wonderful."

For Ali Offman, who was Schwartz's patient before she worked with her as a nurse, the service "meant a lot. I knew she was going to take her time and she takes pride in what she does for our family. It was a beautiful bris."

Laura Dallal, the twins' mother, said she chose Schwartz after she read her letter to the editor of the Toronto Star about pain control during circumcisions.

"Her philosophy was in keeping with our view to give the boys an anaesthetic," she said. "We wanted to minimize the pain for the babies."

Laura Dallal also was impressed with Schwartz's desire to personalize the ceremony. "She involved the women a lot, much more than any brit we had attended.

"It was a beautiful ceremony. She personalized it and her attention to detail really showed during the ceremony."

NORTH YORK GENERAL HOSPITAL
BRANSON DIVISION

A vision for ambulatory care services at Branson

Our commitment to meeting the health needs of the community

North York General Hospital assumed the governance, management and operations of the former North York Branson Hospital in May 1998. Since then, we've worked hard to maintain services in the community and continue to operate Branson Division as a full service acute hospital including emergency care.

We also have been busy planning for the future role of the Branson site: redevelopment into an ambulatory care centre with special focus on services for seniors. The Centre will offer a wide range of health services for people living in north central Greater Toronto from Dufferin Street to Victoria Park, and from Lawrence Avenue to Highway 407.

The community surrounding Branson has a large number of seniors. For this reason, many of the programs offered at the ambulatory care centre will promote wellness and help seniors manage on a daily basis. As well, the Centre will play a key role in linking people to other services provided in the home, community, hospital and long term care (nursing home) facilities.

Our vision for a comprehensive, state-of-the-art facility will set the standard for ambulatory services in Ontario. It will help bridge the gap between hospital and home and we will work closely with community partners to meet the needs of our diverse community.

Now it's time to share our vision with you.

What is an ambulatory care centre?

An ambulatory care centre is a community health centre where patients come and go during the day because there are no beds for overnight treatment. People can visit their family doctor for a routine check up, see a specialist, and have tests and procedures — all on an outpatient basis.

Our proposed services

Primary Care:

- Groups of family physicians, nurses, social workers, and other health professionals will work together in teams to look after patients of all ages.
- An After Hours Clinic with direct follow up to family physicians will be available when physician offices are closed.
- An Urgent Care Centre will be open 16 hours a day, to handle a wide range of illness and injury.

Seniors' Wellness Services:

- Specialized geriatric services will be provided in the home or at the Centre. This group of services will be designed to help maintain independence and ability to live at home as long as possible.

Specialized Ambulatory Services:

- Health education and promotion.
- Clinics for diabetes, chiropody, ear nose and throat, neurology, urology, and more.
- Cardiac and respiratory diagnosis and rehabilitation.
- Ophthalmology diagnosis and treatment.
- Rehabilitation for injuries such as fractures, repetitive strain, and degenerative conditions.
- Diagnostic imaging like x-ray, CT scanning, ultrasound and mammography, and possibly MRI.
- Minor surgical procedures.

Mental Health Services:

- A wide range of services will be available including outreach teams, crisis intervention, substance abuse programs, an eating disorder program, and special services for seniors with mental illness.

When will it happen?

The new ambulatory care centre will be completed by late 2003. In the meantime, the Branson Division remains open for business as usual, including emergency care and inpatient programs. Some ambulatory services may also be put in place at the Branson site to start setting the foundation for its new role.

We want your feedback

Please let us know what you think of our plans to develop a comprehensive ambulatory care centre on the Branson site. Standing by our community

North York General Hospital has a proud tradition of providing quality health services in new and innovative ways. One of our guiding principles is to provide the right care, in the right place, at the right time, by the right profession. The ambulatory care centre will enable North York General to fulfill our commitment and reach this standard of excellence.

Sarah Zelsman celebrates 100th birthday

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
CJN Staff

TORONTO — Birthday greetings for Sarah Zelsman came from Queen Elizabeth, Prime Minister Jean Chrétien and Mayor Mel Lastman.

But the warmest birthday wishes were expressed by Zelsman's family members, who gathered recently at a special brunch in honor of her 100th birthday.

Four generations of her family – Zelsman is the mother of four, grandmother of eight and great-grandmother of 12 – were present at this elegant birthday party at the Sutton Place Hotel, attended by 70 people.

Dressed in a black, embroidered, ankle-length dress, her honey-brown hair perfectly coiffed, Zelsman looked far younger than her chronological age.

And her memory was in fine form, too. Not only can she rattle off the birthdays and phone numbers of her large family, she also remembers times and dates of all her phone conversations, granddaughter Francine Kerdman told the assembled guests.

Indeed, Zelsman had little trouble recalling her early days in Toronto. She came from Belarus at the age of 12, with her sister Dora, to join an older sibling, she said.

"I arrived here on a Friday and I went to work on Monday."

She also lost that job in the garment industry by the first afternoon; she asked someone the time, and her employer fired her on the spot for talking, she said.

"He was only paying me $3 a week. Two weeks later, I got a better job doing piece work, and I was making between $10 and $12 a week."

At 16, she met her husband Jacob; he was to become a co-owner of Atlantic Fur Company, and three years later they married.

In the 1930s the couple moved from downtown to Forest Hill to raise their four children, the late Leonard and Edward; and Marvin and Frances (Steinberg), her two surviving children, who with their spouses, hosted the birthday brunch.

Zelsman's husband died in 1967, and in the early '80s she lost a granddaughter to cancer.

Steinberg described her mother as a dedicated parent and grandmother, and as the consummate balabusta. "She was always there. Our house was open house."

Zelsman was active in several charities, among them Hadassah and Baycrest.

One of Steinberg's fondest memories is of her mother's volunteer work at Baycrest Centre, she said. "She would bring in residents from the home. They would have lunch and sing songs in Yiddish."

Her home was the venue of 12 charity teas a year, and during the war years she invited Jewish soldiers to her home on Shabbat and the holidays."I always had my table full," Zelsman told The CJN.

Many of her grandchildren remember her always being in the kitchen, and they cited personal favorite dishes from her culinary repertoire.

For Howard Zelsman, his grandmother's chicken fricassee was second to none, while his cousin Barbara Biel's personal favorite were the butter cookies or bubbie cookies, as she called them.

They said their grandmother usually had a coke and a cigarette in hand.

She quit smoking at the age of 90 when she was treated for pneumonia, and moved to an apartment in the Eglinton and Bathurst area where she resides today, granddaughter Lisa Casselman said.

"She's the best grandmother," Casselman said."She would tell you what was on her mind if you wanted to hear it or not. I still get phone calls."

Zelsman is believed to be the oldest member of Beth Tzedec; she and her husband joined the Goel Tzedec in 1936.

In her speech, granddaughter Kerdman said that words could not adequately honor her grandmother, whom she described as an "extraordinary, loving, perfect person."

Perhaps granddaughter Jackie Cohen summed it best: "While my grandmother is fortunate enough to have, not only her physical, but her mental health, I am the one who is truly fortunate to have such a beautiful and remarkable woman as my grandmother."

SAJAC Seniors mark 20 years

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — SAJAC Seniors, an offshoot of the South African Jewish Association of Canada (SAJAC), is 20 years old this year.

"We joined as soon as we arrived," said Goldie Greenberg, who moved here from Johannesburg 10 years ago with her husband Sydney, to be closer to their children and grandchildren.

"Our children actually forced us to join," she admitted. "They reckoned we needed friends of our own."

Thea Abramson and Yossi Yaldor, her predecessor as chair of SAJAC Seniors, are seen with the Chai Dancers at an Israel at 50 event last year. [Gerald Berley photo]

Now the couple has a large circle of friends, said Greenberg, 77. Within SAJAC Seniors, Sydney serves as treasurer, and Goldie does the catering.

"I really do enjoy the fact of getting together with all these South Africans," she said. "We have so much in common."

Unlike the main group, SAJAC Seniors – which has grown from a handful of people to 320 – is primarily social, with monthly outings to places like Stratford or the race track in summer, and indoor events, often with entertainment, at the Banbury Recreation Centre during the colder months.

They also donate money to local and Israeli charities at the end of each year, and contribute to a SAJAC bursary fund.

SAJAC Seniors chair Thea Abramson, 80, enjoys telling the story of a conversation she had with a younger woman affiliated with SAJAC. "She said, 'You have much more fun than we do. When can I be a senior?'"

The seniors group was started by Len and Nancy Rubenstein with a nucleus of about 10 people. "It's a lot of fun," says Len, 83. Over the last few years, the group has tripled in size from over 100 to over 300, with about 45 or 50 regulars.

SAJAC "juniors" – as the seniors call them – was established 22 years ago to help integrate South African newcomers into the existing Jewish community here.

"We did not want to see created Hadassah or UJA groups that were South African – or anything that would isolate South Africans," said Alan Sandler, who co-founded SAJAC with Hilly Cohen and the late Ronnie Roth, shortly after he (Sandler) immigrated in 1976.

Rather, SAJAC offered practical information on Jewish organizations and schools, and other concerns of new immigrants.

Because there were relatively few South Africans here, newcomers turned to SAJAC whereas now they are more likely to turn to family or friends who are already here.

Sandler was 36 when he and his wife Lorraine immigrated with two school-age children. At the time, there was "no structure in Toronto to deal with English-speaking Jewry," he recalls.

Today, the SAJAC magazine – a twice-yearly publication featuring community news, household tips and a community yellow pages section – is sent to over 1,800 households, including those of the senior members.

According to UJA Federation statistics, there are up to 5,000 South African Jews in the Greater Toronto area.

The first wave of immigration was in 1961, following the Sharpville riots, with a second wave in 1976, and a third in 1985, said SAJAC magazine editor Heather Super, who has been here 12 years.

Current immigrants are predominately singles, young couples and seniors, she noted.

"The role of SAJAC has changed," Super said, explaining that the magazine and a "job find" program have superseded the social aspect.

"We help place quite a few people," said Colin Baskind, who serves as SAJAC president and co-runs the employment program.

When he arrived here 11 years ago, he said, he was helped by someone "who didn't know me from a bar of soap. I thought, 'When I get settled, I've got to return all this.'"

Abramson, a former concert pianist, is chair of SAJAC Seniors. She has been involved since shortly after she and her husband Abe immigrated from Johannesburg in November 1981. Their daughter, son-in-law and grandchildren were then living in Guelph.

Although Abramson joined a Hadassah-WIZO chapter and plays bridge with a Canadian woman, she and Abe have particularly enjoyed the "spirit of togetherness" they found with fellow South Africans at the seniors' group. "This was wonderful for us, as for a lot of newcomers," she said.

Abramson has no regrets about immigrating. "We adapted very well."

CHAT teen gets top marks in math contest

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — There are days when Mark Daniels can't start his homework until 10 p.m., given his heavy schedule of extracurricular sports activities.

But the tall, well-spoken Grade 9 student at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT), enjoys and excels at his academic pursuits just as enthusiastically as he participates on his school track and volleyball teams.

Recently Daniels, 14, received the top mark possible in his category at the International Tournament of the Towns Mathematics Contest, which he wrote at the University of Toronto.

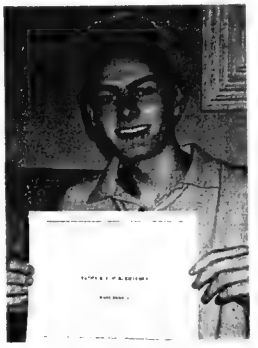
Daniels, who takes enriched Grade 9 math, wrote the junior "A" level exam, the more difficult of two levels open to younger high school students.

The Tournament of the Towns started locally in the former Soviet Union with three cities (Moscow, Leningrad and Riga) in the late 1970s. Today, high school students from 85 "towns" in more than 20 countries participate in the tournament, run under the auspices of the USSR Academy of Sciences.

Considered one of the most difficult mathematics contests, the tournament is 4½ hours long.

Daniels' score – 17.33 out of 14 – was based on his best three answers out of five. The marks added up to over 100 percent because they were multiplied by 1.3 so as not to put Grade 9 students at a disadvantage against Grade 10 students.

Daniels' South African-born parents, Steven and Janine, who immigrated here with their older son in 1982 after a stint in Israel, had no idea the competition would be such a challenge. "The kids came out white from the contest," Janine said.



Mark Daniels

Anthony, Mark's 18-year-old brother, is another all-rounder. A molecular biology student at Princeton University, he placed third in the International Avogadro Chemistry Contest, and brought home seven gold and two bronze medals from the JCC North American Maccabi Youth Games in Hartford two years ago.

"He's one of the people that really inspired me," said Mark.

Both brothers – who, their mother recalls, read at age 2 – hope to study medicine.

Mark prepared for the Tournament of the Towns, in part, by going over previous exams posted on the Internet.

He also takes part in a math club at the University of Toronto where "they give you problems and teach you how to think logically. That's a lot of fun."

As a student at Associated Hebrew Schools last year, he entered other math competitions such as the Gauss Mathematics Contest sponsored by the University of Waterloo.

Math comes easily to Daniels, he said. "I enjoy it. There's lots of thinking. It's interesting because there's always new things to learn and it's amazing how people think up all the theories. It's a lot different from all the other subjects, except for maybe Talmud."

The latter involves much logic, said Daniels, and "lots of math" in calculating appropriate payments for damages.

Math and science are his favorite subjects, but he also enjoys Tanach, Talmud and gym, Daniels said.

Although he admits to missing "a bit of school" because of his heavy involvement in sports – he also does track and field three times a week at York University and is just beginning track meet season – his Grade 9 average is over 90 percent.

"CHAT is a lot of fun," he said. "There is more freedom, and it's more of a challenge."

Jordan's King Abdullah answered letter

THORNHILL — When Barbara Mamann and her husband Michael wrote a letter of condolence to the family of the late King Hussein of Jordan, she didn't expect a response.

But a few weeks after she mailed a hand-written note to the royal family, expressing her sadness at the king's death from cancer, her phone rang.

On the other end was a representative of AT&T Canada, saying she had a telegram from the new king of Jordan.

"Dear Barbara and Michael," the operator read, "the Royal Hashemite family joins me in thanking you for your kind message on the very sad occasion of the death of my father." The message was signed by Jordan's new king, Abdullah Bin Al-Hussein.

"I felt all tingly," Barbara Mamann told The CJN. "It was very exciting, a very pleasant surprise. It shows there are still good people in the world."

She said she felt compelled to write the royal family because the late king "was such a good and brave man. I felt in my heart that I just had to write."

A few days after the call, the telegram arrived by mail. Mamann said she will have it matted and framed, and it will hang prominently in her Thornhill home.

According to the Jordanian embassy in Ottawa, it was common practice to respond to each and every letter of condolence received by the royal family following the king's death. Everyone who sent a note received a response, a spokesperson said.

Christian service resists 'forgetfulness' of Holocaust

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Millions of lives could have been saved if other church leaders had supported Pastor Martin Niemoeller in his fight against the Nazis in Germany, according to the past president of the Canadian Council of Churches.

Dr. Heather Johnston, the main speaker at the 19th annual Christian Service in memory of the Holocaust at Metropolitan United Church, said Pastor Niemoeller had pleaded for a lifting of the boycott against Jewish shopkeepers in the 1930s, but other church leaders failed to speak out.

Johnston is the daughter of the secretary to Pastor Niemoeller, who was head of the Confessing Church of Germany.

She said the service sponsored by the Christian-Jewish Dialogue of Toronto (CJDT) coincided with the infamous voyage 60 years ago of the St. Louis, filled with refugees from Germany who were turned away from Cuba and later from the United States and Canada.

Johnston said she was shocked to find a museum in St. Petersburg, Fla., offering "fun" rides to children in boxcars of the type used to carry Jews to concentration camps. The museum even advertised that it had the actual spikes used in the railways that took Jews to Treblinka.

"We should not allow the Holocaust to be the subject of such banality," she said.

One of the most powerful moments in the service came when the Metropolitan United Church's minister, Rev. G. Malcolm Sinclair, read out "the summons to remember."

"Our remembrance is a profound form of resistance and a radical act of solidarity," he said. "We resist the forces of forgetfulness and denial."

Candles representing the death of six million Jews were lit by survivors and members of their families. The first branch of the candelabrum was short to symbolize more than one million children who died. A seventh candle represented the Righteous Gentiles who risked their own lives to rescue Jews.

Those who lit candles were Max Eisen and his granddaughter, Amy; Judy Engel and her daughter, Tina; Dr. Sandor Tonelli, a Righteous Gentile; Dr. Wilfried Boothroyd, Canadian veteran of World War II; Case Ootes, deputy mayor of Toronto; Eligah Bemrose-Fetter, representing the youth of the church; and Inge Spitz, a hidden child in France and her son, Jack.

Following this solemn ceremony, K'El Maleh Rachamim was sung by Cantor Martin Steinhouse and then Eisen, a survivor, recited the mourners' Kaddish.

Holding lighted candles, the congregation then followed the participants to the parish house for a reception.

Poignant moments came when Joseph Steiner, president of UJA Federation, read the poem Fear, written by 12-year-old Eva Pickova in Theresienstadt, and Dr. Wiprecht von Treskow, consul general of Germany, read the words of Pastor Niemoeller, including the lines: "Then they came for the Jews, and I didn't object, for I was not a Jew; and then they came for me, and there was no one left to object."

Others taking part in the service were Rev. Karen Hamilton, an officer of the United Church of Canada; Rev. Friedhelm Pieper, general secretary of the International Council of Christians and Jews; Sister Jocelyn Monette of Our Lady of Sion, reading from The Diary ofAnne Frank; Rev. G. Cameron Brett, pastor, St. Andrew's Presbyterian Church; Rev. Steven Bemrose-Fetter, minister of Metropolitan United Church; Rev. Brian Prideaux, chair, Christian-Jewish Dialogue of Toronto; and Joanna Wilson, co-chair, Holocaust Remembrance Committee, CJDT.

TORONTO — In last week's CJN, a photo montage of events surrounding Yom Hashoah neglected to mention that the honoring of 10 Holocaust survivors at Queen's Park was co-sponsored by the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem.

Queen's Hillel helps get frosh week events rescheduled

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

KINGSTON, ONT. — Frosh week at Queen's University is "a huge deal," according to Orrin Wolpert, president of Queen's Hillel. "You make your friends for life that week."

Which explains why Wolpert, a third-year engineering physics student, took it on himself to lobby for a schedule change when he realized last fall that Rosh Hashanah 1999 would coincide with the end of frosh week on Saturday and Sunday, Sept. 11 and 12.

Although there is no Hillel staff at Queen's – which has 100 Hillel members among an estimated Jewish student population of over 500 – Wolpert was in contact with Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto staffer Tamara Kochberg, a Queen's alumna, about the situation. She served as "a sounding board," she said.

Wolpert, with hopes of getting frosh week moved, initially contacted dean of student affairs Bob Crawford, who referred him to university chaplain Rev. Brian Yealland, chair of the university's inter-faith council (made up of students representing different faith group).

Wolpert realized it would be more realistic to focus solely on the highlights of the week, among them semi-formals, "tamming" ceremonies (at which students receive a tam, recalling the Scottish roots of the university), and the engineering "grease pole" (an event at which students attempt to retrieve a hat at the top of a lanolin-covered football goal post), traditionally held on the Saturday.

Wolpert attended the next inter-faith council meeting at Rev. Yealland's invitation.

A motion was passed recommending that major orientation events be moved, and letters were sent by Wolpert and Yealland jointly to students and faculty members involved in organizing frosh week.

"With the biggest events normally happening toward the end [of the week], we wanted to make sure the Jewish students got full opportunity to participate," said Wolpert.

After a number of intermediary steps, the university senate – the highest governing body of the university – passed a motion in February that no traditional events be held after 2 p.m. on the Friday (erev Rosh Hashanah), said Wolpert.

Among the goals of orientation week are ensuring a welcoming environment and introducing students to a number of Queen's traditions, said Patrick McNeill, co-ordinator of Town-Gown Relations and secretary of the Senate Orientation Activities Review Board (SOARB).

This year, he added, a new goal will be to raise awareness of Rosh Hashanah among non-Jewish students so they will recognize that Jewish students are "leaving for an important reason."

There was no resistance at all to making the proposed changes, said McNeill.

"We were truly impressed with...the students involved and with Hillel in their willingness to come together and discuss ideas...so that everybody could participate well," he said.

SOARB supported "the need to accommodate students who observe Rosh Hashanah," noted Kathy Jackson and Peter Dawe, SOARB co-chairs in a memo to the university Senate.

A concert is set for one of the Rosh Hashanah evenings, "with our full endorsement," said Wolpert.

This is most likely the first time frosh week events have been rescheduled, although accommodations have been made on an individual basis in the past, said Rev. Yealland, to ensure, for example, that students missing a first class for Rosh Hashanah would receive handouts and an update on their return.

"This is the first time the whole university has said [it would] change our whole program to accommodate [a particular] group," said the chaplain. "To me that's great."

NATO criticized

American Jewish Committee described NATO's mission as "noble," saying that basic principles of human rights and collective security are at stake.

Musafija, two of whose three children were born in Belgrade, the capital of Serbia, said he felt compelled to call The CJN.

"The Jewish people should stay by the Serbian people," he said, explaining that Serbs and Jews were persecuted by a pro-German Croat fascist state and Albanian sympathizers during World War II.

"If the Serbs hadn't resisted Nazi Germany's invasion in 1941, I wouldn't have been alive."

Born and raised in the Bosnian city of Sarajevo, Musafija said that 65 of his relatives were murdered during the Holocaust by the Germans and their local allies.

The survivors in the Musafiya family found refuge among the Serbian population of Croatia's Krajina region, he added.

What finally triggered his indignation, was an appeal issued by novelist Elie Wiesel on behalf of Kosovo Albanians. Wiesel, a Holocaust survivor, declined to equate Serbia's ethnic cleansing program with Germany's genocidal policies. But Mussafija was upset when Wiesel claimed that Serbian actions justified NATO bombing of Yugoslavia.

A television producer and a theatre critic in the old Yugoslavia, he acknowledged that the Yugoslavian regime is ousting Albanian Muslims from Kosovo. But he pointed out that the Kosovo-based Kosovo Liberation Army (KLA) is a "terrorist organization" trying to break up what remains of Yugoslavia.

The Serbs, he said, are not barbarians, but "a civilized, democratic people."

Demonstrably pro-Serbian, he prefers to use expressions like "ethnic engineering" and "social rearrangement" to describe Yugoslavia's policy of ethnic cleansing in Kosovo.

In his view, the Serbs are not attempting to destroy the Kosovo Albanians in Nazi-style fashion, but to resettle them.

Musafiya said that the concept of ethnic cleansing in Yugoslavia is nothing new. Tito, the former president, started the process by expelling ethnic Germans from Vojvodina after World War II. The Croatian government refined it in the early 1990s with the expulsion of hundreds of thousand of ethnic Serbs from Croatia.

"The Serbs did not invent ethnic cleansing."

Musafija said that Canada itself may be faced by the spectre of ethnic cleansing one day. "I'd like to see what would happen to Anglophones and native Indians who were not loyal to an independent Quebec nation."

And, he suggested, Israel practised ethnic cleansing of Palestinian Arabs during the 1948-49 War of Independence.

Asked whether Milosevic is a war criminal Musafija observed that this issue should be left to The Hague's war crimes tribunal. He said that, from a political vantage point, he disliked Milosevic.

Musafija immigrated to Canada in 1992 under the sponsorship of the Jewish Immigrant Aid Services "to breathe fresh air."

His parents, Albert and Sara, currently reside in Corvallis, Ore., but lived in Israel from 1992 until 1997. Albert and Sara were professors in the faculties of medicine and political science, respectively, at the University of Sarajevo. They are now retired.

His two sisters, Tamara and Miriam, also live in Corvallis. By a quirk of fate, Tamara was born in Jerusalem in 1965 when her father was on a leave of absence at the Hadassah Hospital.

Musafija's cousin, Zelyko Mrcarica, is a resident of Belgrade, which has been bombarded by NATO. On April 3, Mrcarica sent him an e-mail message.

He wrote: "The beasts hit the building of federal and republic police this morning...I hope there is no one killed...this building is very close to a hospital, maternity clinic and psychiatric clinic...It is horrible to imagine what might have happened...All in all, this targeting of the centre of Belgrade...represents the biggest shock for me."

Kosovo refugees get aid

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — In the past three weeks, Winnipeg's Combined Jewish Appeal has raised $13,000 for the Kosovar refugees.

The campaign kicked off on April 8, the last day of Pesach, with appeals in the synagogues. That was followed by a press release to the media.

"The response has been gratifying," says Evelyn Hecht, director of community relations for the Winnipeg Jewish Community Council. "We have had people calling and walking in with cheques."

Hecht says that the Winnipeg community was one of the first to contact the Council of Jewish Federations (CJF) about taking action on the crisis. "We have had good support from the CJF and the Canadian Jewish Congress," she says.

The funds raised here are going directly to the Jewish Agency to support its non-sectarian work among the Kosovar refugees.

Scene in Ottawa

By

Jews have being petitioning governments since they first went into exile. In Canada, there is a long tradition of representations to various levels of government on issues of concern to the Jewish community.

One of the best examples relates to pro-Israel activities, where the community has developed a specific structure, the Canada-Israel Committee, to act in its behalf. Another example is the Nazi war criminal file. In that case, both B'nai Brith Canada and the Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) have advanced the community's position with the Department of Justice and the solicitor general.

Sometimes, various agencies believe that a "Jewish" perspective on general policy issues should be heard. Thus, organizations like CJC and B'nai Brith find ways to comment on the Constitution, social policy, federalism and the like.

All of the above implicitly claim that the positions are advanced in the "name" of the Jewish community. Increasingly, that may no longer be the case and the Jewish establishment had better watch out!

The so-called "ultra-Orthodox" in Montreal and Toronto are becoming very comfortable in the halls of government – any government. Learning from the successful experiences of their co-religionists in the United States, chassidic groups are lobbying governments for their own projects. And it would appear that they are doing so to great effect.

This all may sound innocent and benign, but it should be of serious concern to the "establishment" leadership. If they cannot co-opt these emerging forces to the broader community agenda, then chances are they will be bypassed and surpassed.

These groups have several advantages. First, they are extremely disciplined, and their leadership can direct uniform support to a particular candidate. Second, they tend to live in very concentrated areas, which makes for a very potent voting block. Third, they really look "Jewish," and politicians love to demonstrate how accessible they are and how comfortably they can interact with every constituency.

It may be time for the community to undertake a new lobbying initiative. Only this time, the target is within, namely, to move in a constructive way to heal divisions and possibly to prevent the image of a fractured community.

Canada's oldest shul to receive coat of arms

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Canada's oldest Jewish congregation, the Spanish and Portuguese Synagogue, will be presented with its own coat of arms from the Chief Herald's office in Ottawa, at a ceremony on Shavuot, May 21.

The congregation, founded in 1768, is receiving this honor thanks to the efforts of its two longest-standing members, Esther and Henry Blaustein. Esther Blaustein is a direct descendant of Aaron Hart, the first Jew to settle in Canada and one of the founders of the Spanish and Portuguese. Her husband's lineage is more modest: his grandfather became a member when he arrived in Montreal in the mid-19th century.

The coat of arms was designed by the office of Chief Herald R.J. Watt, using symbols that conform to the ancient art of armorial bearings and at the same time are suitable for a modern-day synagogue.

The Spanish and Portuguese's coat of arms features the colors blue, purple, scarlet, gold and silver, inspired by the Lord's biblical injunction to Moses: "The children of Israel shall make an offering of silver and gold, and twine of blue, purple and scarlet, and it shall be for a sanctuary, that I may dwell among them."

Red and gold are also the colors of the flags of Spain and Portugal, the lands of origin of the synagogue's founders.

On the shield are four silver pillars representing the four buildings in Montreal where the Spanish and Portuguese has been housed over its history. Beneath them is an unfurled sefer Torah, and below that a menorah, which is also inspired by the Exodus story, Blaustein said. ("And thou shalt make a candlestick of pure beaten gold.")

The sefer Torah is in the middle because, in Sephardi synagogues, the reading table is in the centre of the sanctuary.

These three symbols are imposed on a blue strip with undulating edges. This represents the St. Lawrence River, which brought the synagogue's founders to Montreal.

Above the shield, which is trimmed in purple, are the tablets of the Ten Commandments, sitting on a wreath of purple, red and silver. They are flanked by two Lions of Judah and topped by a maple leaf, a tribute to Canada, "where our people found a haven and security from tyrants in Europe and the Middle East," Blaustein said.

On the red and gold ribbon beneath the shield, the Shema is inscribed in Hebrew.

Blaustein said he got the idea of applying for a coat of arms from Congregation Shaar Hashomayim, the first synagogue in Montreal and only the second in Canada to have one commissioned. It was presented to the synagogue by Gov. Gen. Roméo LeBlanc in 1995, on the occasion of the congregation's 150th anniversary. Chief Herald Watt also made a speech at the time.

The Blausteins, not the congregation, sponsored the coat of arms themselves, and the ceremony May 21 will be a low-key presentation, following the Shavuot service.

"A coat of arms gives a certain dignity," Blaustein said. "Heraldry exists so we can say, 'Here's who we are, here's where we have been, and here's where we are going.'"

Heraldry has deep roots in Jewish tradition, he noted. The 12 tribes had their own shields, and the practice of bearing coats of arms was common among the Jews of Spain, he said.

Today, the Spanish and Portuguese membership is a mix of Sephardim and Ashkenazim from many countries. The Blausteins are a symbol themselves of that blend: she came from the Sephardi tradition, he the Ashkenazi.

They met at a young people's program at the synagogue, when it was located downtown on Stanley Street, north of St. Catherine.

The new coat of arms of the Spanish and Portuguese Synagogue will be formally presented May 21.

Security Cabinet orders Orient House closed

By GIL SEDAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

A stately100-year-old mansion in eastern Jerusalem has repeatedly been the focal point of Israeli-Palestinian tensions over the city both sides claim as their capital.

Now, with Israeli elections only a few weeks off, and with Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat still mulling whether to declare statehood when the interim period of peacemaking ends next week, Orient House has once again become the object of a tug of war.

Analysis

Last week, Israel called for the closure of offices at Orient House, which serves as the Palestinian Authority's de facto headquarters in Jerusalem.

The closure order against Orient House was issued by the Security Cabinet after the top Palestinian official in Jerusalem, Faisal Husseini, hosted some 30 diplomats there on April 21, Israel's Independence Day.

Although the order may take some time to implement through the proper legal channels, which will give Palestinian officials the opportunity to appeal the move, the Security Cabinet's decision was the latest sortie in the political battle for Jerusalem.

Defending the order, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu described Husseini's decision to host the meeting as an example of "unusual chutzpah."

Not only had the meeting taken place on the day marking Israel's 51st birthday, the prime minister said, but Husseini had greeted the diplomats by saying: "Welcome to the capital of the Palestinian people, Jerusalem."

"The people of Israel are not willing to tolerate this," said Netanyahu, "and I am not willing to tolerate this."

Critics of Netanyahu – Israelis and Palestinians alike – linked the closure order to the election campaign.

For his part, Husseini, who serves as the Palestinian official responsible for Jerusalem affairs, said there was nothing new about the meeting with the diplomats; indeed, that he had held "thousands" of similar meetings in the past, with no Israeli intervention.

Netanyahu has in the past, explained the lack of Israeli action against Orient House by downplaying the importance of those meetings, Husseini said.

Husseini acknowledged that he referred to Jerusalem as the capital of the Palestinian state – "just as you refer to it as the capital of Israel."

He also accused the Israeli government of trying to sow unrest between Jerusalem's Arab and Jewish residents, adding that the Israeli government is attempting to return to the "days before" the Oslo accords, which call for the two sides to discuss Jerusalem – probably the most difficult issue facing them – as part of the final-status negotiations.

Warning that if Israel were to close Orient House, "the possibility of making peace would disappear," Husseini cautioned, "Don't push us."

The closure order was also criticized at home.

Political observers noted that the order reflected the Likud party's election strategy of showcasing Netanyahu as the custodian of Israel's "eternal capital."

Often a critic of the prime minister's policies in the peace process, President Ezer Weizman said he did not believe that the "sensitive issue of Jerusalem should be blown up over Orient House.

"Maybe it's necessary to calm down a bit," he added.

Two of Netanyahu's rivals in the race for prime minister also criticized the move.

Yitzhak Mordechai, the Centre party candidate, urged the prime minister to remove the Jerusalem issue from the election campaign.

Ze'ev "Benny" Begin, the leader of a right-wing bloc in the race for prime minister, described the measure as "artificial, too little, and too late."

The Palestinian press, by Arafat's order, played down the significance of the closure order, hoping that the legal process surrounding it would drag on long past Israel's elections.

Orient House has functioned as the centre of Palestinian activities in Jerusalem since the late 1980s, long before the launch of the Oslo process in 1993.

Husseini, whose family owned the building that once served as a hotel, established his offices there as the head of an "Arab studies society," and later as head of the Palestinian negotiating team for the Madrid peace talks in 1991.

The closure order was the latest in a series of measures and countermeasures taken by both sides to establish facts on the ground in Jerusalem before the start of the final-status negotiations.

Israel, for example, has approved the construction of a new Jewish neighborhood at Har Choma in southeastern Jerusalem, supported Jewish purchases of Arab properties in the eastern portion of the city, and has pursued a policy of confiscating the Israeli identity cards and revoking the residency rights of former Arab residents after they spend lengthy periods abroad.

As part of their ongoing Jerusalem campaign, the Palestinians have encouraged the return of former Arab residents to the city, and have repeatedly attempted to bolster the Palestinian Authority's presence in Jerusalem.

Moreover, Palestinian plainclothes police are known to operate in the city, the Palestinian Education Ministry controls the curricula of eastern Jerusalem schools – with the silent consent of the Israelis – and they have established a variety of organizations in the city, including offices devoted to health, sports, statistics and vocational training.

All Israeli governments, including Netanyahu's, have accepted the Palestinian presence in Jerusalem.

Every now and then, Israeli leaders have flexed their political muscles, issuing one closure order or another.

But they have generally managed to live with a clear reality: The Palestinian Authority operates in Jerusalem to a much greater degree than any of them would openly admit.

Shin Bet informer charged in Rabin case

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — An Israeli court has charged a former informer for Israel's domestic security service with failing to prevent the 1995 assassination of Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin.

According to prosecutors, Avishai Raviv, who was recruited to join the Shin Bet in 1987, failed to inform his handlers that Yigal Amir planned to hurt or assassinate Rabin.

Raviv, known as "Champagne" by his Shin Bet handlers, was also charged Sunday with supporting a terrorist organization as a result of his involvement in founding the extremist group Eyal, which allegedly fostered violence.

If he is found guilty of all charges, he faces up to seven years in prison. Raviv and Amir knew each other from their student days at Bar-Ilan University.

Declassified portions of a government report issued in 1997 said Raviv failed to tell the Shin Bet about Amir's repeated boasts that he was planning to kill Rabin.

Raviv was closer to [Amir] than anyone else in organizing student demonstrations and weekends in Judea and Samaria," according to the Shamgar Commission report. It was surprising "that in his report on Yigal Amir, he did not mention or hint at Amir's known statements about plans to attack the prime minister, which he voiced more than once in his circle of friends," the report said.

In a separate development, a Tel Aviv district court rejected an appeal from Amir's friend, Margalit Har-Shefi, who was sentenced last year to nine months in jail on similar charges.

Har-Shefi's attorney said he planned to file an appeal with Israel's Supreme Court.

Amir is serving a life sentence for Rabin's murder. His brother Hagai is serving a 12-year sentence, and a friend, Dror Adani, was sentenced to seven years for the crime.

Jewish Agency provides aid for Kosovo refugees

according to information provided to The CJN by UJA Federation, which in turn, is briefed by Agency officials.

The latest arrivals are comprised of women with children whose fathers were unable to leave Belgrade.

The Jewish Agency held an information session for them at JAFI headquarters, with individual and group counselling made available.

Advice will be also available on all phases of aliyah, from immigrants' rights to educational opportunities and programs.

So far, local donations to Toronto UJA Federation's Kosovo Relief Fund totals more than $30,000. In excess of $10,000 has been channeled to a similar fund begun by Canadian Jewish Congress, which includes contributions to Montreal's FEDERATION CJA.

In the past three weeks, JAFI has sent over 100 tons of humanitarian aid and supplies on an airlift consisting of seven planes. Agency staff distributed tents, blankets, coats, mattresses and food to the thousands of refugees.

Although the team was stationed in Tirana, Albania, where the planes landed, Agency officials traveled to the camps needing help. The first planeload of aid and supplies was distributed in Pishcina and Mullet, near Tirana.

Convoys loaded with aid and supplies from the subsequent six planeloads travelled to southwest Albania to aid refugees who fled from Macedonia with nothing.

Chaim Chesler, co-chair of the JAFI aliyah & klitah committee, went to Tirana as part of the operation and reports that the chicken farm in Fierre that was turned into a refugee camp was absolutely shocking.

The physical and sanitary conditions were ripe for outbreaks of diseases; there were people sleeping on the floor among chicken droppings, and there were no toilets or other sanitary facilities, Chesler said. The Israeli team provided much-needed mattresses, blankets and food.

The 112 Muslim Albanian refugees brought from Kosovo by the Israeli government under Agency auspices earlier this month, are settled at the Maagen Michael Field School. They are slowly learning about life in Israel, and receiving necessary medical treatment and social work intervention, as well as learning Hebrew.

Meantime, the situation for the remaining 100 or so Belgrade Jews in Budapest is described as tense and strained. Women and children are displaced and separated from their loved ones. Although the children have been placed in local schools, there is still too much time on everyone's hands with no structure in their lives.

A small number of Jewish women have been travelling back and forth between Budapest and Belgrade to check on their possessions and property. Men are forbidden to cross the border.

Israel Election Notebook

May 17

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Sources in One Israel say they are worried that party leader Ehud Barak's announcement that he will not give the Interior Ministry to Shas if he forms a government, will mean the haredi Sephardi party will declare "all-out war" against Barak in the second round of voting on June 1.

The sources say that until Barak's announcement, Shas planned to keep a low profile in the second round of voting. But after Barak announced that he would keep the ministry out of the hands of Shas, because of its policy of making life difficult for new immigrants unable to prove their Jewishness to the satisfaction of ministry officials, Shas will gear up to try to defeat the One Israel candidate in the expected runoff against Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu.

According to the sources, this information was brought to Barak, but his headquarters hopes that the estimated 70,000 lost Shas votes will be replaced by those of new immigrant voters who will appreciate Barak's defence of their cause.

Meanwhile, at a campaign committee session led by Labor party secretary general Ra'anan Cohen, concerns were raised about whether Arab voters will turn out in the second round to vote for Barak.

"We could be in big trouble," said one participant, if the Arab vote doesn't come out in the second round. With regard to the Russian vote, participants said that there are signs that Barak is gaining votes in the sector, though he still doesn't have the 36 percent that Shimon Peres won among Russian voters in 1996.

Nonetheless, the session heard reports that many Yisrael B'Aliya activists are combining their party campaign with calls to vote for Barak.

Community building dedicated as Germany's Reichstag reopens

By TOBY AXELROD
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

BERLIN — Last week, Monday was the day the nation's renovated Parliament building, the Reichstag, reopened as a gleaming, glass-domed symbol of democracy spun from the wreckage of Nazism.

The Parliament held its first session in the renovated Reichstag, marking the return of the nation's capital to Berlin.

But for the nation's Jews, the day had additional significance: The Central Council of Jews in Germany officially dedicated its new headquarters in Berlin. And in another part of town, work began on a new school for Jewish teachers sponsored by the New York-based Ronald S. Lauder Foundation.

As a mezuzah was nailed to the front door of the building housing the new offices of the Central Council, Ignatz Bubis, the group's president, joined Rabbi Joel Berger, the national rabbi of Germany, in chanting prayers of thanks for having lived to see this day.

Later, speaking to invited guests and reporters inside the building, Bubis said the move was a "logical consequence" of the reunification of Germany and the move of the government from Bonn to Berlin. But he called it a coincidence that the Reichstag opened on the same day.

German President Roman Herzog said the new Jewish office "opens a new chapter in the post-war history of German Jewry."

Also moving into the building, known as the Leo Baeck House, were Germany's Jewish newspaper, the Allgemeine Jüdische Wochenzeitung, and the European Jewish Congress (EJC), of which Bubis also is president – the first time the EJC opened an office in Germany.

The building formerly housed the College for the Science of Judaism, shut down by the Nazis in 1942. The school boasted such illustrious teachers as Leo Baeck and Martin Buber, and such students as Solomon Schechter and Abraham Joshua Heschel.

The new mezuzah on the Leo Baeck House is quite possibly the only one in Berlin on the outside of a building, a police guard said. Like most other Jewish centres in Berlin, the building will have a round-the-clock guard.

That Monday, renovations also began in the former East Berlin on the former Talmud Torah of the Rykestrasse Synagogue, which will house the new school for Jewish educators founded by the Lauder Foundation.

Lauder Foundation school

"This is Jewish life looking backwards and forwards, all at once," Joel Levy, the foundation's chair in Germany, said in an interview.

The synagogue was the only one in Berlin to survive the Third Reich intact, he said. Today, services are held there regularly.

Last summer, Rabbi Chaim Rozwaski arrived from New York to begin teaching. Currently he has 14 students, about half of whom are of Russian background.

Two young American Orthodox rabbis – New Yorkers Josh Spinner and Binyamin Krauss – are scheduled to join Rozwaski this year.

"We are making a statement of confidence that there is a future here," said Levy. "Jewish life is growing."

The German Jewish population has tripled to as many as 100,000 since Germany's reunification in 1990, mainly due to the influx of Jews from the former Soviet Union. Berlin has the largest community, estimated at about 20,000.

Before 1933, Germany had some 500,000 Jews, about 175,000 of whom lived in Berlin.

Today Berlin has seven active synagogues, a Lubavitch representative and a new egalitarian congregation. The Jewish Museum recently opened, although there is nothing yet on display. Steven Spielberg's Survivors of the Shoah Visual History Foundation has opened an office here; the American Jewish Committee has been here since the summer of 1997; and the Lauder foundation since 1966.

Last week, Berlin hosted the annual conference on Jews and Germany sponsored by the Bertelsmann Book Corporation. And in May, female rabbis and cantors from Europe and America will gather for a conference here.

Germany's dark past – particularly Berlin's status as capital of Hitler's planned "1,000-year Reich" – was in the air Monday, as legislators gathered for the symbolic first sitting in the renovated Reichstag.

Real business is slated to begin this summer, when some 20,000 government employees will have moved here from Bonn, capital of the former West Germany since 1949.

More than 100 years old, the Reichstag was destroyed by a suspicious fire after Hitler was sworn in as chancellor in 1933. It was further damaged during battles at the end of the war.

Far from a symbol of Nazism, the Reichstag was the "most democratic institution" in pre-Nazi Germany, said Israel's ambassador to Germany, Avi Primor. "The Nazis abhorred this building."

The Israeli Embassy will move to Berlin this summer, he added.

Russian court bans Moscow neo-Nazi group

By LEV KRICHEVSKY
Jewish Telegrapic Agency

MOSCOW — Russia's largest and best organized far-right organization has come under fire on several fronts.

Last week, a court in the Russian capital banned the Moscow branch of the neo-Nazi Russian National Unity (RNU) movement, a group that may have been responsible for an attack recently on a synagogue in Minsk, the capital of the former Soviet republic of Belarus.

The court hearing was initiated by Moscow city prosecutors, who charged among other things that RNU members were involving minors in their political activities, and that the group was operating illegal branches in other parts of Russia.

None of the charges brought against the group, whose members wear black uniforms and sport armbands reminiscent of the Nazi swastika, centred on its neo-Nazi character or on its attempts to incite ethnic, religious or racial strife, a punishable crime under Russian law.

Just the same, Moscow Mayor Yuri Luzhkov, who last December blocked the RNU from holding its national convention in Moscow, hailed the court's decision and said his office will continue to work against the neo-Nazi group.

Before the verdict was announced, RNU leaders said they would ignore the court decision, adding that they plan to participate in Russia's parliamentary elections, which are slated for December.

Last year, the RNU's leader, Alexander Barkashov, said he may run in next year's presidential elections.

In a separate development, authorities in the Russian town of Borovichi banned neo-Nazi activities, granted a public space to the local Jewish community, and initiated a seminar to counter anti-Semitic and hate propaganda among the town's youth.

The moves followed an international campaign launched by U.S. Jewish groups after the tiny Jewish community of 200 in Borovichi, a town of 90,000 people about 300 miles northwest of Moscow, reported a dramatic increase in the neo-Nazi activities.

Last fall, hundreds of stickers saying "Jews Are Rubbish" and showing a man throwing a Star of David into a garbage can appeared in Borovichi.

And this year, dozens of posters proclaiming, "The Yid Is a Plot Against Russians" appeared across town.

According to Edward Alexeev, the leader of Borovichi's Jewish community, his repeated appeals to the town's mayor seeking support for the community yielded no results.

But, he added, the situation changed dramatically after a campaign was launched by the Union of Councils for Soviet Jews and the San Francisco-based Bay Area Council of Jewish Rescue and Renewal.

As a result of the campaign, Alexeev said, the mayor received during the past two months, at least 600 letters of concern from across the United States, including members of the U.S. Congress, and from such countries as Germany, Spain and Japan.

The authorities "immediately changed their stand," Alexeev said in a telephone interview, adding that he was amazed to see the result.

The anti-Semitic posters "disappeared overnight," he said.

The mayor also turned to the Jewish community for help in organizing a two-day seminar aimed at curbing the activities of neo-Nazi groups.

In the attack on the Minsk synagogue, which coincided with the Orthodox Christian Easter on April 12, arsonists set fire to the entrance of the Dauman Street Synagogue and the slogan "Bash the Yids, Save Russia" was spray-painted on the synagogue's wall.

No one was injured in the incident, but the synagogue's door was destroyed.

Yuri Dorn, a Jewish leader in Minsk, said teenagers with the RNU may have been responsible for the attack.

Yakov Basin, a longtime Jewish activist and the director of the Minsk-based Belarus-American Bureau on Human Rights, which is affiliated with the Union of Councils for Soviet Jews, said the incident was just another sign of rising anti-Semitism in this former Soviet republic.

According to Basin, RNU supporters have recently been distributing anti-Semitic materials throughout Minsk.

Earlier this year, a group of RNU supporters severely beat three members of a leading human rights group in Belarus.

Britain to get Holocaust museum

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LONDON — Leaders of Britain's Jewish community unveiled plans last week for the construction of a $12 million Shoah Centre, scheduled to open in 2005 in the city of Manchester.

The primary purpose of Britain's first national Holocaust museum will be to focus attention on the kind of prejudice that formed the foundation for the murder of six million Jews.

One display will depict modern manifestations of racism.

"In this way, we can show that the attitudes that caused the Holocaust still survive," said historian Bill Williams, chair of the project.

The museum was designed by architect Daniel Libeskind, who recently completed the Jewish Museum in Berlin.

The Manchester museum will be composed of the architect's trademark "fragments," representing the shattered shards of the globe, with each splinter housing a display.

The design is intended to complement the nearby Imperial War Museum, also designed by Libeskind.

The museum's exhibits will not emphasize the emergence of the Nazis or their tools of genocide, but rather will focus on the experiences of Holocaust victims, Williams said. "It will be about how the Holocaust was experienced by individuals, families and communities."

Feet love Walking On A Cloud

Interested in specialty footwear for adults? Try Walking On a Cloud. The owners, the Vella family, have been in the shoe business for 40 years; the staff are experienced people who know their footwear.

Walking On a Cloud carries major brands like Easy Spirit, SAS and Clarks of England, well-known trademarks like Birkenstock, and the popular Danish Ecco. There are fashion styles too, but only those which combine looks and comfort.

There are prescription shoes recommended by podiatrists and foot surgeons, and special fittings for every shape and size. Most models have supple, breatheable full-grain leather uppers, and light, shock absorbing polyurethane soles. And for every customer, Walking On a Cloud measures the length, width and arch of both feet.

Poor fittings, says Director David Vella, cause 70% of foot problems. By the same token, well-fitting shoes promote overall health: they're shock absorbers for your whole body.

Footwear, Vella insists, should be comfortable for walking, and durable. In a good fit, toes are loose, heels snug and not too high, and fasteners adjustable; linings are breatheable, and the footbed's comfortable. Also, shoes should fit on first wearing, without break-in time.

So try Walking On a Cloud; the Don Mills store is at 939 Lawrence Ave. East in the Don Mills Centre. Hours Mon.-Fri. 10-9, Sat. 9:30-6, Sun. 12-5; tel. 441-0013.

There are other locations in Etobicoke, Burlington, Newmarket, Oshawa and our new store in Welland.

Old box held a treasure of reels and memories

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

"Sometimes," Lisa Lewenz reveals at the beginning of her 62-minute documentary film, A Letter Without Words, "people put things away and they forget about them. My family tried to forget things about their past."

The secrets started emerging in 1981, when Lewenz was 13 and a singer in the choir of the Episcopal church that her family attended. One day, she discovered a box of old films in the attic.

The reels contained some very polished raw footage shot by her paternal grandmother, Ella Arnhold Lewenz, in her native Germany in the 1920s and 1930s, and subsequently forgotten after the family came to America in 1938.

Her grandmother's films held many surprises, the paramount being that the family had been Jewish.

In A Letter Without Words, Lewenz tells the story of this momentous discovery and delves into the lives of her grandmother and the rest of her family in pre-war Germany.

Lewenz interviewed many relatives, to learn as much as she could about her grandmother, a gifted amateur photographer, as well as other family members.

The family was wealthy and moved in important circles, apparently. Their associates included celebrated figures like Albert Einstein and Leo Baeck, and many noteworthy German-Jewish artists.

As the documentary relates, Lewenz returned to Germany in 1987, camera in hand, hoping to learn all she could about her ancestral past.

She visited the family's former home in Berlin, a stately mansion beside city hall. The house is now the civil records office for the city.

In a huge Jewish cemetery in Berlin, one of the largest in Europe, she found an enormous family crypt, overgrown with half a century's worth of uncleared brush.

Removing the weeds, she made a moving discovery: "There, in stone, was my family name, and something I had never seen with it before – the Star of David."

Lewenz spared no efforts to unravel the mysteries of her grandmother's life. She stood on precisely the same spots where her grandmother had stood.

She hired a lipreader to retrieve family conversations frozen in the silent footage. And she uncovered an amazing cache of letters and diaries, once belonging to her grandmother which provided much insight into the family's pre-war existence.

Though Lewenz' grandmother left raw footage rather than finished films, she indicated many marks where she would have spliced and edited. "Ella knew what she was doing," Lewenz explains. "It was like she was handing me a baton in a relay race."

Ultimately, grandmother and granddaughter share credit for making the film, though the honor is posthumous for Ella, who died in 1954. Still, Lewenz says her grandmother "worked alongside as a silent partner, leading me to a life I never would have imagined."

A Letter Without Words belongs to the school of modern Jewish art that seeks to re-establish a connection to a lost or forgotten world. Lewenz' discovery and her restorative quest make for an engrossing story.

A Letter Without Words is being screened at this year's Toronto Jewish Film Festival, May 4 at 2 p.m., with Lewenz in attendance. For tickets, call 324-8600.

Film bio studies 'mystery' man

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Who was Joseph Cassuto?

Was he, as some of his American colleagues contend, a man who lacked courage and conviction, someone afraid of his own shadow? Was he, as his son-in-law has said, "some obscure clerk in a Japanese cotton firm?"

Or was he much more – a beloved and trusted friend to the Japanese, a skilled unofficial ambassador who helped open diplomatic relations between Egypt and Japan, and a mysterious, almost angelic presence who knew how to make himself the centre of attention at gatherings?

As it happens, whatever else he was, he was the grandfather of American filmmaker Alan Berliner, who has made Cassuto the focus of a fast-paced, award-winning documentary, Intimate Stranger.

A Palestinian Jew, Cassuto was raised in Egypt, and served in Alexandria as the commercial representative of the Japan Cotton Trading Company. A Zionist, he is shown in one photo walking with Chaim Weizmann.

Was Cassuto a trusted advisor to Weizmann, or was this just one more example of his mystical talent for always appearing in photographs in the centre of activity, like Woody Allen's Zelig?

More mysteries surround Cassuto's dealings with the Japanese, whose language and culture he understood, and whose traditions he revered.

His many Japanese friends came to him often in Alexandria for advice. After trade between Egypt and Japan was halted during World War II, Cassuto was obliged to come to America. But even after Pearl Harbor he never forgot his Japanese friends. After the war, he sent many packages to them, earning their eternal gratitude.

In the late 1940s Cassuto was offered the right to be the exclusive distributor of Canon products in the United States, but he lacked the business confidence to move on the deal, which would have likely made him a multi-millionaire.

Instead, he left his family in America and returned to Egypt, where he felt most at home and where he resumed his former duties for the Japan Cotton Trading Company.

Intimate Stranger hints that Cassuto might have had a Japanese wife and perhaps even another family in Alexandria.

One thing is clear: not since Arthur Miller's play Death Of A Salesman, which focused on the angst-ridden Willie Loman, has so much artistic attention been paid to a travelling salesman.

Intimate Stranger is compelling not because it delivers an A&E Biography-style treatment for someone who is perhaps undeserving of it.

We are intrigued because of the multitude of questions and mysteries that Berliner raises about his own grandfather, a seemingly ordinary man whose life story has spun so fully into myth only 25 years after his death.

Punctuated by the beat of a typewriter, the film sensitively presents a parade of images and ideas that pause long enough in the right places for us to consider the big questions that underlie Berliner's inquiry.

How does one sum up the life of a human being? How well do we know the people, even our own kin, who are supposedly closest to us in all the world?

Intimate Stranger presents lively quotes from people who knew Cassuto, including family members.

For instance, a male voice says at one point: "I never met anybody who disliked him – other than the immediate family. I would have loved to have been his friend rather than his son. He would do anything for a friend."

His Japanese friends honored Cassuto posthumously in 1990 with a ceremony at which Berliner and his camera were present.

How did they regard him? As an American? An Egyptian? A Jew? According to a Japanese colleague, Cassuto was "an international man. He was just Mr. Cassuto."

According to his daughter, Berliner's mother, Cassuto left behind "the legacy of a good name." That, ultimately, may be the thing that she and other family members can be most certain about.

Berliner – who delved into his father's life in the film Nobody's Business, shown at last year's festival – obviously has much skill in bringing out the mysteries inherent in a human life.

Sixty minutes in length, Intimate Stranger is being shown with the 28-minute Israeli dramatic film, Babcha, a production of the Tel Aviv Film School, 4:30 p.m. May 6, at the Toronto Jewish Film Festival. For tickets, call 324-8600.

THE RIVER MIDNIGHT WINS FICTION AWARD

Lillian Nattel's The River Midnight, a rich evocation of life in a 19th-century Polish shtetl, is the winner of this year's Martin & Beatrice Fischer Prize for fiction. The award, which includes a $1,000 honorarium, is due to be given to the Toronto author June 9 at the Leah Posluns Theatre.

Several other winners in the 11th annual Jewish Book Awards were also announced. Nora Gold is winner of the Louis Lockshin Prize in short fiction for her collection Marrow and Other Stories.

Queen's University historian Gerald Tulchinsky's Branching Out has brought him the Joseph & Fay Tanenbaum Award for Canadian Jewish history.

Poet Ken Sherman wins in the category of literary criticism for his collection of essays Voice & Void, while N. N. Shneidman wins the prize in Jewish history for Jerusalem of Lithuania, his history of Vilnius.

The Yad Vashem Prize in Holocaust History goes to Winnipeg writer Allan Levine for Fugitives of the Forest.

The annual prizes, which celebrate books on Jewish themes published in Canada during the previous two years, are awarded annually by the Koffler Centre's Jewish book awards committee. Winners in the categories of poetry, Holocaust memoir and biblical scholarship should be announced shortly.

Film Fest Mini-Reviews: The Toronto Jewish Film Festival (324-8600) opens April 29 and runs until May 6, with some 63 screened offerings in two theatres at the Hyland Cinema on Yonge Street north of St. Clair. Here are brief reviews on a few more titles:

• Shtick, Schmaltz and Shtereotypes: Jewish Images in the Cinema. This is a compilation of rare footage from the early days of cinema to roughly 1960. We see a row of turbaned Jews dancing in Jerusalem in 1903, a Jewish pawnshop proprietor in a Charlie Chaplin sketch, and George Stanley as a cinematic shlemiel in Cohen on the Phone.

The two-hour compilation also features longish bits with Eddie Cantor, George Burns and Gracie Allen, Willie Howard and Jack Benny, and includes some stereotypically racist cartoons showing a bearded Jew frequenting a Chinese laundry.

Unless you're a film buff, you're liable to find the material too slow and formulaic. Curator Murray Glass will be in attendance to provide narration. May 2, 1:30 p.m.

• L.A. Mohel. This new U.S.-made video by Toronto filmmaker David Bezmozgis is an entertaining, smart look behind the scenes of ritual circumcision. What does it take to become a professional mohel? Who would willingly choose to make it his (or her!) life's work?

In only 22 minutes, Bezmozgis tells us all we need to know on this little-considered but intriguing subject. One can only wonder what he might have left on the cutting room floor. May 5, 7 p.m. (Shown with the Israeli film, The Fifth Commandment.)

• The Personals: Improvisations on Romance in the Golden Years. This recent U.S.-made film brought its director, Keiko Ibi, an Academy Award nomination earlier this year, and for good reason. The 37-minute documentary cleverly probes the romantic feelings of seniors in Manhattan who are performers in a play about the search for love.

Frank, optimistic and sometimes sad, The Personals offers a glimpse into the lives of old people without the usual stereotypes. May 6, 7 p.m. (Shown with god@heaven and Visas and Virtue.)

Yiddish Song: Yiddishland Café presents The World and I: Songs by the Yiddish Poet Abraham Reisen, featuring Miriam Eskin, Sasha Luminsky, David Wall and Martin Van de Ven. May 9, Workmen's Circle, 471 Lawrence Ave. W. Doors open 7 p.m. $12 in advance, $15 at the door. 635-0720 or 787-2081.

* * *

More Yiddish: The Friends of Yiddish (FOY) is hosting a 15th anniversary gala dinner and dance, featuring Harvey Atkin, Michael Mandel and the Jordan Klapman Trio. All present and former FOY members are especially invited.

Authors helped reverse conviction

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Sam Chaiton and his colleagues are surprised and puzzled that they were not consulted about the making of a film in Toronto based on Lazarus and the Hurricane, a book co-written by Chaiton.

The film, bearing the same title as the book and directed by Norman Jewison, deals with how a Canadian group, with help from others, overturned the miscarriage of justice in the United States in which black boxer Rubin "Hurricane" Carter was imprisoned for 20 years for murders in 1967 in Paterson, N.J., murders he did not commit. Carter was freed without bail on March 7, 1985.

"Terry Swinton and I wrote the screenplay and the book, but Jewison and his crew did not get in touch with us," said Chaiton, 48. "We can only hope that the film will show how minorities like blacks and Jews can be subjected to racism as Carter was.

"My late parents were in a concentration camp at Bergen-Belsen, and I'm very sensitive on the subject of racism," he said.

The film is expected to be shown in movie houses at the end of this year.

Chaiton, Swinton and six other Canadians, who wish to remain anonymous, had been involved in a humanitarian mission that brought Lesra Martin, a young black from a deprived background, to Toronto from New York at the age of 15.

In a Toronto public library, Martin came across Carter's book, The Sixteenth Round, which detailed the fighter's long incarceration.

Inspired by that book, Martin and the Canadians, with the help of three attorneys in the United States, fought for Carter's release, researching the case and submitting many briefs to the courts over a period of years.

Martin became so interested in the legal questions around Carter's case that, after earning a graduate degree in anthropology, he studied to be a lawyer and now is a Crown attorney in Kamloops, B.C.

Lazarus and the Hurricane, published in 1991 by Penguin Books Canada, details the story of the battle to free Carter.

The boxer came to Toronto in 1986 as a result, and is now an activist in pursuing justice for people wrongfully convicted. His part in the film is played by well-known Hollywood actor Denzel Washington. Chaiton is portrayed by Liev Schreiber.

The Toronto man pointed out that the situation blacks face in the United States has not changed much from the days when he and his colleagues fought for Carter's release.

"At that time, one in every four blacks was involved with the criminal justice system in U.S., and now it is one in three."

Chaiton and his colleagues are still helping underprivileged people, this time from Jamaica, through a project called Big it Up, which makes hats for companies. (Big it Up is a popular positive expression in Jamaica, Chaiton says.)

This project started when the group met Damein Royes, a Jamaican in his 20s, and got interested in helping find employment for other people in that country.

Actress crashes audition, gets part

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A juicy part and her first big break came for 26-year-old Lisa Baylin when she crashed an audition for Better Living, the George Walker play being revived at Factory Theatre, April 30 to June 6.

Lisa landed the part of Gail, the youngest daughter in a weird family that inhabits Walker's play, and she's ecstatic about it.

"It's my first big part in a leading Toronto theatre, and my first extended run," said the Ottawa-born actor whose mother Kayla, is still performing in amateur musicals in Ottawa. Her father Michael, a businessman, is on the board of the Canadian Theatre School.

"I never had an appointment to audition for Walker, who is directing his own play, but he let me read for the part, and this is part of his generous nature."

Lisa Baylin

Though most of her high school and Queen's University theatre experience has been in musicals, Baylin said she wants "to do it all," and her non-singing role in Better Living fits the bill.

She plays the role of a no-nonsense teenager, wise beyond her years, in a cast of seven which includes Nancy Beatty, David Fox, Michael Healey, Thea Gill, Fiona Highet and Jamie Robinson. Gill and Highet play her older sisters.

What Baylin likes about Walker's direction, is his willingness to accept suggestions from the actors. For example, this "tweaking," or minor adjustments, resulted in dropping one line, "Not really," in a scene with boyfriend Robinson, which Baylin said has improved it beyond measure.

Doing it all, in her own words, means that she has done TV commercials and acted in Strange Justice, a movie shot in Toronto, for a cable network in Unitd States, not yet shown.

An honors graduate in drama/history at Queen's University, Baylin moved to Toronto three years ago to pursue a professional career in theatre.

She hopes Better Living willl open the door to that future.

Historic synagogue a centrepiece of Budapest area

By DEREK CASSOFF
Special to The CJN

BUDAPEST — The authorities call it District VII, a rather bleak name for an area so steeped in history and culture. But for tourists visiting the site of Budapest's former Jewish quarter, there is no mistaking the sights and sounds of this compact neighborhood, once the centre of Europe's fifth largest Jewish community.

The kosher bakeries and butcher shops that once lined the area's narrow streets have long since disappeared, replaced by a crop of taverns and travel agencies. But a few lasting remnants in this district just east of Budapest's bustling downtown core offer visitors a glimpse into what was once a thriving Jewish precinct.

The Dohany Street Synagogue, a towering mosque-like structure at the corner of Dohany and Tanacs streets, serves as the gleaming centrepiece of this otherwise run-down area, much as it did when it first opened its doors to Jewish worship in 1859. The largest synagogue outside of the United States, the colorful brick building stands out because of its Moorish design, inspired by the Turks who ruled Hungary for 150 years and left their mark on many of this country's older buildings.

Inside the 4,000-seat synagogue, seven years of restoration work are beginning to yield results. While the barren, worn-out seats hark back to an era of humility, the ornate stained glass windows and chandeliers provide an interesting contrast to the otherwise modest synagogues that dot the rest of the eastern European landscape.

The restoration work was started in 1991, when the fall of Soviet-inspired communism gave way to a new era of religious freedoms. The Hungarian government, looking to curry favor with western nations, has agreed to foot 80 percent of the $6.4-million bill, with the remainder being covered by contributions from world Jewry.

In fact, Budapest city planners hope to use the synagogue restoration as a springboard to a grand-scale renovation of the entire neighborhood that would include the redevelopment of apartment blocks and the construction of underground parking garages. Thoughts of attracting a small Orthodox community back to the area are also tossed about by politicians and the local media.

Next door to the synagogue, on a site that once housed the flat where Theodor Herzl was born, sits the Jewish Museum of Budapest, a two-storey structure whose simple exterior belies its rich and varied collection of Jewish artifacts. From old mezuzot and prayer books to kiddush cups and sets of tfillin, the museum describes the routines of daily religious practice and sheds light on Jewish holiday celebrations.

It's a worthwhile stop for its wealth of religious treasures, which include a four-foot high menorah and a seder plate from Hungary's famed Herend china factory. The museum offers guided tours in English – a welcome relief, since most of the descriptions are written only in the complex Hungarian language.

A dimly lit chamber at the back of the museum chronicles the plight of Hungary's Jewish community during the 11 months of Nazi occupation when three-quarters of the country's 800,000 Jews perished. Among the starkest displays are Torah scrolls turned into drum covers and a tallit knitted into a skirt, both retrieved from the Nazis following the war.

The walls of the room are lined with maps and photographs from the Budapest ghetto; they describe, in chilling detail, the horrible living conditions to which the residents of the ghetto were subjected. A portrait gallery near the exit pays tribute to those who risked their lives to save Jews during the Holocaust, including Raoul Wallenberg, the Swedish diplomat who is estimated to have saved thousands of lives by issuing passes to safe houses set up throughout Budapest.

Directly behind the Dohany Street Synagogue, in a spacious courtyard that once served as the departure point for Jewish transports to the Nazi death camps, visitors stumble upon the metallic Willow Tree, the city's largest and most impressive monument to its Holocaust victims. Designed by renowned Hungarian sculptor Imre Varga, the memorial was erected in 1989 to coincide with the 45th anniversary of the Nazi occupation of Budapest.

The tree and its eight branches are in the shape of an inverted menorah and are said to represent the final resting place for the hundreds of thousands of Hungarian Holocaust victims who have no proper graves. The end of each branch is marked by a scar from which hundreds of smaller leaves sprout – symbolic of the resuscitation of Jewish life in Hungary after the Holocaust.

In fact, despite 45 years of repressive Communist rule and the current economic hardships brought on by the move to capitalism, Hungary's Jewish community of 100,000 remains strong and defiant. It may be the biggest attraction of all in Jewish Budapest today.

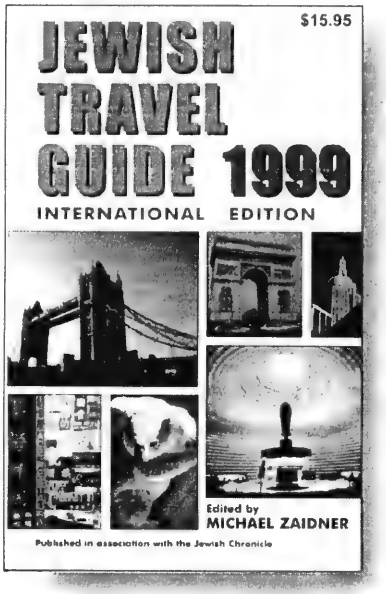
Jewish sites abound from A to Z

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter



A hypothetical situation: You've visited Buenos Aires, Athens or Paris, and have seen all the sights. Now you've got one or two more days left before you head back home.

Why not visit a kosher restaurant, a synagogue or a Jewish museum? But where do you go and who do you phone?

You'll have no such problems if you've tucked the Jewish Travel Guide 1999 (Sepher-Hermon Press, New York) into your handbag. It's your key to Jewish communities around the world.

The latest edition, which runs to 419 pages, is encyclopedic in terms of countries listed. The first brief entry deals with Albania, which is home to about 100 Jews. Zimbabwe, with 900 Jews, rounds off the list.

Canada, in case you wondered, is allotted 11 pages. Community organizations, synagogues, museums, restaurants and the like are included.

Strangely enough, Toronto is credited with having one single Jewish bakery, while Montreal has seven. What gives?

As expected, the entries on United States, Israel, Britain and France dominate the book.

As the TV pitchman is fond of saying, don't leave home without it.

Travel books prepare you for trips to exotic locales

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Travel requires careful preparation. It's not enough to get up and go. The following guides, published mainly by Lonely Planet and distributed by Raincoast Books, will help you plan your trip.

Are you thinking of a grand European tour? Europe on a Shoestring, whose range extends from Andorra to Yugoslavia, is a useful primer.

Andalucia, that picturesque, historically important, sun-kissed province of Spain, attracts tourists by the plane load. And Andalucia is the perfect guide.

Panama, as the travel writers never cease to proclaim, is waiting to be discovered. It's a country of vast jungle wilderness (especially the Darien gap), deserted Caribbean beaches and great deep-sea fishing. If you're willing to take the plunge, immerse yourself in Panama.

Southern India is extraordinarily diverse in terms of peoples, cultures and landscapes. It's really a world onto itself, as you'll find out by reading South India.

Africa is exotic, and if you've never had the fortune of travelling there, why not start with Zimbabwe, Botswana & Namibia?

A feast for the eyes, the Amazon is amazingly rich in flora and fauna. So curl up with Amazon Rainforest, an Oxford University Press publication to which younger and older readers alike can relate.

The grandeur of rocky peaks inspires travellers. Through the medium of crystal-clear photographs and stirring text, Distant Mountains captures the spirit and awe of high mountains around the world.

Star-crossed lovers will love Romantic Days and Nights in Vancouver and The Best Places to Kiss in the Northwest. They're your guides to romantic destinations in British Columbia (as well as Washington and Oregon). Ski Canada, on the other hand, is the last word on skiing resorts.

Last but not least, Michael Kluckner's Canada: A Journey of Discovery is a talented watercolorists' impressions of a scenic land, while the 1999 edition of the National Geographic Road Atlas should set you on your way in Canada, the United States and Mexico.

Community explores future of NYGH's Branson

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The emergency unit at the Branson division of North York General Hospital (NYGH) should be kept open, even after it closes as a hospital in 2003.

This was the clear sentiment of 150 people who attended a community meeting on the future of the Branson division, sponsored by the hospital.

"Without an emergency unit [at night], it is not a hospital," said one audience member to loud applause and shouts of "hear hear."

The statements asking that an emergency unit be maintained and that the present shut-down at night be eliminated all drew applause.

"It's absolutely wrong to close the emergency at night. At least keep it open at night when it's needed most," said one angry resident.

In response to the many questions on the future closing of the emergency unit, NYGH president Murray MacKenzie said the Ontario government has already directed that Branson be closed as a hospital.

The aim is to make Branson a state of the art ambulatory centre, as a model of the future.

Urgent care centre

He told The CJN that 95 percent of the patients who now come to the Branson emergency department would be able to get attention at the division's new urgent care centre.

These patients would be stabilized at Branson, and if necessary, transferred by ambulance to NYGH.

When a resident said he could drive his wife to NYGH faster than an ambulance could take her, MacKenzie warned that it would be dangerous to do this.

"If your wife is suffering severe chest pain, you – or no member of your family – should be driving her to hospital; you should be calling an ambulance."

There was no answer when the resident asked who would pay for the ambulance in that case.

Though it will have no acute care in-patient beds, in its new life, Branson will serve more patients than it did before, MacKenzie said.

The new Branson will have an urgent care centre operating 16 hours a day, and an after hours clinic operating from 6 p.m. to 10 p.m. and on weekends to look after patients whose doctors' offices are closed, said Dianne Anderson, NYGH vice-president. The urgent care centre will be staffed by personnel from the NYGH's emergency unit.

It will also have a day medicine unit, a geriatric day hospital for people who have had strokes and cardiac problems, and a geriatric day treatment unit with bathing facilities for those who cannot bathe themselves.

The present Branson has 98 interim long-term care beds, and an application will be made to have 150 more long-term beds after it closes as a hospital, Anderson said.

At the moment, only patients in acute care hospitals who are waiting for long-term beds are eligible.

The seniors' health centre at the NYGH has 36 long-term beds and 25 percent of its patients are Jewish, she said. It also serves many other ethnic groups.

MacKenzie noted that seniors require six times more medical services than other patients, and this is one reason the new Branson will emphasize services to them.

Within four kilometres of Finch and Bathurst, there are 14,000 residents over age 65 today and within 26 years, this age group will be 25 percent of the total population in that area, he said.

In answer to a questioner, he said seniors in the hospital's catchment area, from Dufferin to Victoria Park, could go to any hospital for service.

Ideas for the new Branson are still welcome from the community, Anderson said, noting that many proposals have come from 400 family physicians on the NYGH and Branson staffs.

The new Branson will have offices for family doctors but none will be forced to come in, she said. (One resident objected that it would take him longer to see a doctor at Branson than in the doctor's old location.)

Day surgery will still be done at the new Branson, but it may cover different areas than before, Anderson said. Mental health services will be expanded on an outpatient basis.

Home oxygen services and an ophthalmologic diagnostic centre, as well as diabetes and asthma education centres, will be part of the new Branson, said Jeff Brown, NYGH planning director.

An audience member wanted to know if people using the ambulatory care centre after 2003 will have to pay parking fees, which at present are $2 for a half-hour.

The parking fee problem has not been addressed but something may be worked out, said MacKenzie.

Port Perry wrestler captures Canadian juvenile title

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — There was a time when Jonathon Blain was pretty definite about the style of wrestling he preferred. Freestyle was the brand for him, definitely not Greco-Roman.

Lately, he's begun to rethink that view – and for good reason. Winning a gold medal in Greco-Roman at the National Juvenile Championships in St. Catharines will do that to you.

"I used to like freestyle a lot more," Blain acknowledges. "Now that I've won the gold in Greco-Roman, I like them the same."

Fighting in the 68 kg class (149.6 lbs.), the 18-year-old resident of Port Perry, Ont. (north of Oshawa) dispatched four opponents, including last year's champ, on his way to the medal podium.

His victory over last year's winner was a nail-biter and barn-burner all at the same time. Blain was trailing three points to one with only 30 seconds remaining when fate – and lots of training – gave him the advantage. He spotted an opening in his opponent's defences, and managed to throw him for three points. He added an extra point by holding him down, giving him the win to the astonishment of many onlookers.

Those last-minute heroics vaulted him into the semi-final, which he won relatively easily. From there, it was on to the gold-medal match versus an opponent from Calgary.

Even though he had lost almost 11 pounds to get down to his fighting weight, his opponent had cut even more, closer to 15 lb., Blain said. "The guy was a lot bigger than me. He'd cut down and he was still a lot stronger than me."

Although he was concerned going into the match, Blain stayed focused, and concentrated on the technical part of the fight. Instead of being psyched by his opponent, he tried to devise a strategy to take him down.

"It was hard to get in close on him," he explained, "but it turned into a very quick match. It lasted about 45 seconds."

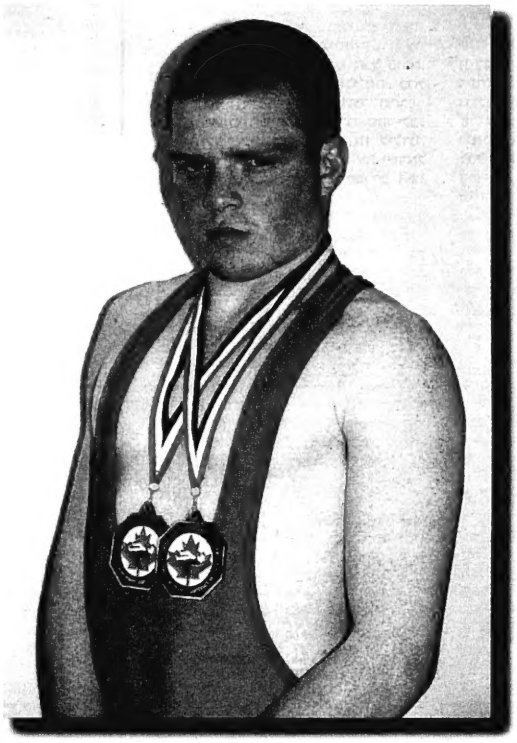
Blain took advantage of a momentary lapse, a careless move by his opponent in which he unexpectedly lifted his arm. "I caught him, threw him and pinned him," he said.

The pin, like a KO in boxing, brought the contest to an abrupt end and gave him the gold. Earlier, he'd won a bronze medal in the freestyle event. For Blain, it was mission accomplished and on to the medal podium, a fairly familiar location for Blain at the end of each wrestling season.

Blain has wrestled competitively and has been provincially ranked since Grade three.

He started by training with the Durham XLs in Pickering, later switching over to the Oshawa Olympic Wrestling Club under coach Don Westlake. The club is known for developing young wrestlers.

Westlake believes Blain has "great potential," including a good chance of making the national junior team next year.



Jonathon Blain

"Jay trains very hard," Westlake said. "Like any individual sport, it's based on dedication" and Jay has "great family support."

In his first-ever tournament while still in Grade three, Blain finished third. Later that year, he won a freestyle silver at the provincial championships.

"I've finished first or second ever year since then in the provincials," he said.

Two years ago, as a 16-year-old, he won the national freestyle Cadet title at a competition in Fredericton. Last year, expecting to repeat, he had to pull out of the event after an early season head injury knocked him off the mat for about a month.

The injury, which led to a gland infection, didn't scare him, though it did tick him off. "I was just upset that I missed the tournament," he said.

It also kept him away from the second sport he loves, rugby.

Blain is a member of the Port Perry High School team, and he also laces up his cleats for the Ontario provincial team.

"I like aggressive sports and I like winning," he explained.

For Blain, wrestling and rugby share another thing in common. They're both "thinking games. In wrestling and rugby, you have to use strategies to beat your opponents," he said. "It's like a chess game. You stay away from his strengths, you work on his weaknesses."

Blain has always preferred freestyle wrestling, which allows fighters to use both the upper and lower body, over Greco-Roman, which limits grappling to the upper body. But mostly, he just likes to wrestle.

Next year will be Blain's OAC year and he'll decide between pursuing a career at either Brock or Lakehead universities. He plans to study social work and sociology while participating in the wrestling program at one of the schools.

Westlake said Blain could well develop into a national senior team member.

Living in Port Perry, Blain doesn't have much contact with other young Jews, but he has made some friends at Camp Robin Hood in Markham where he's a summer counsellor. Blain would love to visit Israel as part of a Canadian Maccabiah team, he said.

Senior skater makes comeback

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — At 71, Meyer Cosman can truly be called the comeback kid of senior speed skaters.

After a five-year absence battling throat cancer, Cosman, a Winnipeg furniture retailer, laced up the skates and picked up where he left off – winning the 70-plus national speed skating championship in Quebec City in mid-February.

A month earlier, he won the Manitoba Masters title. (The masters category includes any skater over 30.)

Cosman's first go round on skates took place when he was a kid. As a teen, he won several medals at three Canadian Junior Championships. At 20, he hung up his blades to concentrate on raising a family and earning a living running the family furniture store.

In 1988, he turned the business over to his son, Jeff, and went into semi-retirement. Looking for something to do, he decided to try skating again. He joined a local masters club in Winnipeg called the Idle Blades and began to skate competitively. He won the Manitoba Open and the Canadian Masters Championship in Ste. Foy, Quebec, in the 60-to-69-age group.

Around that time, Cosman developed a persistent cough which was diagnosed as throat cancer. He hung up his skates while he was being treated for the illness.

Although he stopped speed skating, he continued his rigorous exercise schedule. He put on hundreds of miles a year on his road bikes during the time he was treated for cancer.

Last year, he decided to return to competitive ice skating. His training involves biking three days a week and running and lifting weights in the gym two days a week.

If he would have had a partner to travel with, Cosman says he would have liked to have competed overseas this past winter. His times, he says, would have been good enough to win championships in Europe.

ספרותנו

מאת: יעל זליגר

ישראל הקטנה

יאני וגם הסבתא, ישבנו פה בצותא
...וסבתא שוב...היא מספרת... איך
ישובים בנתה היא... ובלילות שמרה
מפני אויב בדממה והניטה, ושרה עם
כולם מתוך הלב...היום הכל פורח,
גדל ומתפתח... הדגל שלי הוא כחל
ולבן, אתמול היום וגם מחר...'
(קטעים משירו של 'זורח טהר-לב:
הדגל שלי). כך סיפרנו אז לילדנו.
והיום? אוהבים, אוהבים את ישראל
שלנו, אך בין השאר מספרים זאת
כך.

אבא, בספרו ההיתולי, העכשווי של
מאיר גולדברג, מביא חביתה כדור-
בלון מצויר ואומר לבנו דניאל: זה
העולם ולבלון הזה קוראים גלובוס.
שואל דניאל: ואיפה ישראל? אבא
לוקח את כדור הארץ, מחזיקו קרוב
לאף, ממצמץ בעיניו ולבסוף מכריז:
מצאתי! והילד מאוכזב: מה, זה כל
ישראל? מדוע לא יכולה ישראל
להיות הכתם הצהוב הענק על
הגלובוס? אבא אומר שואת סין ולא
ישראל. לטענת הילד שישראל הכי
קטנה בעולם, האב אומר שיש
מדינות עוד יותר קטנות, כמו
לוכסמבורג, מונקו וליכטנשטיין.
אולי, אומר דניאל, אבל יש ארצות
שמנות כמו לוב 'ירוק ישראל קטנה
כמו זבוב.' אבא עונה שיותר כיף
לגור בישראל מאשר בלוב. (כאן
מופיע בספר איור משעשע של זבוב
מחזיק בדגל ישראל.)

כאשר סבא וסבתא באים לביקור
מראה להם דניאל את הגלובוס
שקנה אבא. סבא מסובב את הבלון
חמש וחצי פעמים, מקמט מצחו
ולבסוף פוסק: "לעזאזל, אני לא
מוצא את ישראל!"

שוב פונה דניאל הקטן לאביו
שיסביר לו בבקשה מה בעצם כל כך
מיוחד בישראל שכן בעניין הגלובוס
ושטחה של ישראל בעולם יש בהחלט
בעיה. ובכן, ממהר אבא להשיב,
ישראל יושבת כמעט באמצע העולם
ובשטח הקטן הזה יש גם חוף ים, גם
מדבר, נחלים, נהר, יער, הרים, יש גם
ים המלח שהוא המקום הנמוך
ביותר בעולם ויש עוד כהנה וכהנה
אלא שעכשיו, מסביר אבא, הוא
רוצה להסתכל בטלוויזיה במשחק
כדור רגל; ישראל נגד בולגריה.
גם לאמא דעה בנושא אלא שדניאל
טוען שהיא בדרך כלל חושבת על
סוגי מאכלים. אמא כל הזמן רעבה
ומדברת על ארצות שונות כאלו
העולם אינו אלא מסעדה אחת
גדולה. ואכן אמא מיד אומרת שמה
שהיא רוצה זה להיות עכשיו בפריז
ולאכול באגט! אך לאחר מכן היא
בכל זאת מציינת במילים רכות שיש
בישראל שמש וריח פרדסים,
מוסיקה של יום ששי אחר הצהרים,
ספורי התנ"ך וירושלים וכן זיתים,
פלפל בפיתה וטחינה מטפטפת.

בינתיים אבא "נח" ממשחק הכדור
רגל ומזכיר מעלות נוספות של
ישראל שבה יש סוגים רבים של
אנשים וגם טנק, מטוס ורובה
ישראלי. אך דניאל לא רוצה
מלחמות בסיפור שלו. אבא מסכים
ומוסיף שאף אחד לא מנצח
במלחמות ובעיקר אנשים טובים
שיירוצים לחיות בשלום, אבל זה לא
תמיד מצליח להם."

בשעת משחק מגלה דניאל בארגז
כלים אולר שויצרי, מפוח שבדי
וסכין יפנית. ובשבידיו האוצרות
הללו הוא חוקר את אמו: ומה יש
בישראל? ואמא זאת אמא והיא
עונה: "ילד אחד שאני אוהבת אותו
הכי בעולם. דניאל מישראל."

עבר יום ולילה אצל משפחתו של
הילד דניאל ואז מגיע איזה איש
לתקן את תנור האפייה במטבח ותוך
כדי סידורים ותיקונים, מתפוצץ
כדור הבלון-גלובוס ומהכדור
המפואר לא נותר אלא חתיכת בלון
עלובה אך, ראה זה פלא, דווקא בעת
מתיחת פיסת הבלון הנפוחה נגלית
ארץ ישראל הקטנה בשלמותה!
דניאל משתולל משמחה: יש, יש
ישראל! יהי ישראל! וגם לאבא כבר
הרבה פחות חשוב שנבחרת ישראל
הפסידה נגד נבחרת בולגריה.

מאיר גולדברג כתב את הסיפור
המשעשע לעזאזל, אני לא מוצא את
ישראל (סדרת דובונים, בהוצאת ידיעות אחרונות, ספרי חמד)ותמוסיף
רלנבונן הפליא בעיטור הספר
באיורים נהדרים.

About Food

Dear Norene

Most of you probably know me best from my cookbooks. Thanks for letting me into your kitchen for the past 30 years. My cookbooks have travelled more than I have! People often come to my signings proudly carrying a food-stained copy of one of my books!

I'm delighted with this opportunity to share "food for thought" and to get your feedback in the form of culinary questions, recipes and food memories.

My life is a four-letter word: food. I thought Y2K compliant meant "Yes, 2 Knaidlach!" I love when people have food names, like Honey, Cookie or Alfredo (my doorman)! I have over 1,500 cookbooks, but my most treasured is a copy of my Processor Cookbook autographed by Julia Child: "Dear Norene, Vive la kosher cuisine!"

I've just returned from a culinary conference in Phoenix where I met "foodies" from all over the world. I attended a workshop on Beyond Kosher with American cookbook authors Ethel Hofman and Joan Nathan. Did you know the first kosher cookbook in America was Jewish Cookery by Esther Levy, published in 1871!

Food manufacturers perceive kosher certification as an exploding marketing opportunity. Two million people keep kosher. Another 2.5 million buy kosher because they consider it purer and therefore better. The remaining market includes Muslims, Seventh-Day Adventists, vegetarians and the lactose intolerant, totalling10 million consumers!

I sampled foods of every kind, from Jalapeno Pepper Brownies to Kasha Chili! Kasha (buckwheat groats) can be enjoyed by vegetarians, diabetics, dieters and those with lactose intolerance. Because it is a fruit and not a grain, kasha is wheat and gluten-free, ideal for those with celiac disease. It is 20 percent higher in fibre than oatmeal (largely soluble), which helps lower cholesterol. An excellent source of plant protein, kasha is available in whole, coarse, medium and fine grains. You don't need an egg to coat whole kasha because the thin seed coating shields each kernel while it cooks, keeping it separate and fluffy.

FAT-FREE KASHA CHILI

28 oz. can diced or stewed tomatoes
3½ cups vegetable broth
19 oz. can pinto or kidney beans, drained and rinsed
1 onion, chopped
2 cloves garlic, crushed
1 tbsp. chili powder (to taste)
1 tsp. each paprika, cumin and oregano
¼ tsp. pepper (to taste)
¾ cup whole kasha (uncooked)

In a large pot, add all ingredients except kasha. Bring to a boil and simmer uncovered 10 minutes. Add kasha, cover and simmer 15 minutes longer, until kasha is tender, stirring occasionally. Makes 8 cups. Freezes well.

Variation: Substitute ½ cup dry lentils for beans. Increase cooking time to 20 minutes before adding kasha.
